Dr. Sunderland's Message:—The illuminating articles which we published in the last five issues of the Reformer on the profound change which has come over western thought on questions relating to religion, should have convinced the reader that materialism no longer holds the field as the moving impulse of modern life in Europe and America. If western nations still continue in their materialistic ways it is from habit and not from conviction. It is this fact that makes much of Tilak's onslaughts in his Gita Rahasya on western materialism stale and meaningless. There is more materialism expounded in the area between Sandhurst Road and Chowpathi in a week than in the centres of western thought in a year. The greatest proof of the reality of a thing is its universality. No human belief has been so universal and in all ages and lands than the belief in an overruling and righteous Power which guides and controls the destinies of men and nations. That Spirit is the sole reality which to the west is a new discovery is a truth anciently realised in India. The important thing for both East and West is to find and pursue the course of conduct which belief in the sole reality of Spirit dictates. Here is a big sphere for co-operation between the best minds of the world. International, interracial peace and harmony cannot be achieved on the material plane where what one gains involves a loss to another. In the spiritual sphere, on the other hand, the gain of one is the gain of all. The spirit of competition, of bargain, has no place in the spiritual sphere. The morning sun first illuminates the hill tops. Great ideas first dawn on the master minds in every age. They slowly permeate into life but they surely do so. The world is in travail for a new birth. India has a great part to play in the near future. All that she has to do is to be true to her highest self.

Parsis and Moving Pictures:—The agitation started by some Parsis, against the inclusion of two Parsi girls in a film produced by a local agency, is an instance of the extreme of irrationality to which communal conceits often lend themselves. Parsis were among the first to introduce moving pictures to the Indian public. The proprietors of several theatres where these are exhibited, are Parsis. Parsi men, women and children form a considerable proportion of the cinema going public. Parsi actors are among the favourite stars of Bombay-produced pictures. Four prominent Parsi citizens are Directors of the Company which has produced the picture which has aroused the anger of the promoters of the present agitation. This Company has for its central figures two of the most prominent persons associated with picture production, Mr. Himansu Ray and his wife, Devika Rani, niece of the Poet Rabindranath Tagore. The Chairman of the Company is Sir Chimanlal Setalvad. Respectability is writ large in every phase of its organisation. The plays and pictures in which Himansu Ray has taken part, have been of a religious and moral character. Mr. Sri Prakash assured the Legislative Assembly, in the course of the debate on Tuesday on the Bill to amend the Act relating to the censoring of cinematograph pictures that 90 per cent of Indian husbands among the masses did not kiss their wives. (They sometimes bite them as police court reports testify.) But Indian pictures as a rule are free from the routine five-minutes-by-the-watch noisy osculation which constitutes half the show in many imported films. It is obvious that if moral considerations alone are concerned, the present agitation is wholly misconceived. To maintain that under even such conditions Parsi women should not find scope for their histrionic talents, is of course untenable at this day. It is offensive to other communities. People who feel like that should abstain from deriving pleasure or profit from cinema pictures. They should not hire women of other communities for a purpose which they consider degrading to women of their own. This was exactly the argument on which the anti-naught movement was based. It cannot be that they regard that Parsi women have not the same moral stamina as women of other castes. The Parsi Protestants have put themselves in a hopelessly untenable position and the sooner they recede from it, the better will it be for the healthy evolution of inter-communal life in Bombay.

 What Shall We Do with the Reforms?—This question is agitating many minds at the present time. Nobody says that the Reforms are the best that could have been conferred on or secured by India or that they meet the pressing needs of the country. Indeed, many think that they are inadequate; several think that they are unsuitable; others think that they are irrelevant; still others think that they are likely to do harm to the interests of the country. We ourselves stand in the third and fourth categories. The best that we expect of the Reforms is that they would not make things worse than they are. Approaching as we do the Reforms from the social reformer's rather than from the politician's point of view, we much fear that they may really prove harmful to the true progress of the people. The men whom they will bring to power will be the rank communalists, the reactionaries who have consistently opposed social changes, or, in the alternative the revolutionaries who would abolish everything and make a clean slate though they are not agreed as to what should be written on it. Some good people say that this is the very reason why the responsible elements in the country, should actively interest themselves in the working of the Reforms to avert the contingency. But the dice is so heavily loaded against them, that there is absolutely no chance of their success against blind conservatives on the one hand, and headlong plungers, on the other. They can make themselves useful not by trying to work the Reforms themselves but by gaining the goodwill of the other two classes whom the Reforms will bring to the fore. People who are of our way of thinking, cannot, even if they have the opportunity, conscientiously take part in the working of the Reforms. For the majority of the population, working the Reforms means only paying the taxes and obeying the laws. That they will continue to do in any case. The people who think that the Reforms, though inadequate and unsuitable to the country as a whole, are quite suitable and adequate for themselves, will, of course, enter councils and accept offices under the scheme. It is not right to question their good faith or their patriotism. Whether they succeed or fail in satisfying the public of the beneficence of their services, depends not so much on their strength of character as in their skill in throwing dust in the eyes of the Governors and Governor-General for the time being. The Reforms do not give more freedom. They only change the manner of captivity. Handcuffs will be replaced by fetters.

Why Sterilise?—We are glad to learn from the August issue of Marriage Hygiene that it is entering in its second year on a wider field of activities. The setting up of editorial offices in Continental Europe and in the East is matter for congratulation. But it would not be advisable to change the name of the journal just because, as an editorial note reveals, some individuals and "customs authorities" think it objectionable. It is much more necessary that careful thought should be expended on the editorials now that Marriage Hygiene has achieved international status. There is a note, for example, on the decision for voluntary sterilisation of lepers at Jalgaon (Reformer, June 10) in the current number which is objectionable. "We do not know," writes the quarterly, "whether anyone now believes leprosy to be an inherited disease. Children born of leper parents, if removed from them at a very early age, do not contract leprosy. This being the case, it looks to us as if beginning the work of sterilisation, the first attempt in India, on lepers will bring it into disrepute. Why not try sterilisation as a birth control measure, the safest and best method for the poor?" In its objection to the Jalgaon scheme, Marriage Hygiene is sound. The advance of medical knowledge has reduced the number of incurable diseases. And the only two which today are considered inheritable diseases are syphilis and alcoholism. No one, we are sure, will recommend sterilisation for drunkards. Leprosy cannot be definitely regarded as incurable. The Jalgaon decision, it is true, merely provided facilities for sterilisation for those lepers who applied for it. Even so, however, it was an attempt to shirk a duty which society owes to these unfortunate sufferers. How lepers can really be helped is shown in the annual reports of the Mission to Lepers which has just entered on its sixty-second year of service. The suggestion that sterilisation can serve a useful purpose in restricting births among the poor, is more mischievous in the economic sphere than the Jalgaon one was from the public health point of view. Voluntary sterilisation will be no use with the poor because no poor man will resort to it of his own accord. One cannot sterilise the poor because they are poor, any more than one can the diseased because they are diseased. Sterilisation is not a method of adjusting social problems, or, for that matter, any problem. It is unfortunate that its advocates should seriously recommend it as a lasting cure for the defects of modern society. Moreover, the editor of Marriage Hygiene ought to know, better than any one else, that birth control is not abolition of births but restriction. Sterilisation with its irrevocable effects cannot be the "best method" of birth control.

Libraries in India :—The Maharaja Gaekwar was the recipient of a high tribute from a representative gathering of librarians and their friends in London at a dinner given in his honour on the 30th May. His Highness in responding to the compliment, described how in his travels he had been impressed by the value of popular libraries in America and elsewhere, and had desired to provide the same benefits as far as possible to his own people. One of the best speeches at the function was made by Mr. J. H. Roberts of the New Statesman, who made some apt observations on the present state of publishing. When he started as a publisher of books, he recalled, a good many publishers would publish a book because they felt they must do so, and there were still some fine names in the book publishing world, and men who carried on the traditions of the early days. Unfortunately of late there had crept into publishing certain methods and a certain lack of principle which he regretted. "One of the worst practices," he said, "was that of boosting an author or a particular book out of all reasonable proportion to the merits of the book itself and to the detriment of really good literature. The consequence was that the first class literature of today was suffering very severely by this thrusting into the limelight of books of less merit." Publishing in this respect only shares the plight which has overtaken all professions. The trail of finance has spread over them all. Mr. Roberts added that librarians took much more into consideration the actual merits of books and were not easily swept aside by the enormous shrieks of advertising and the undue boosting of certain authors which were often meant to capture other writers, and not so much to sell the book. But librarians, too, have not escaped the influence which has affected publishers. In connection with this occasion, Mr. Newton Dutt, lately State Librarian of Baroda, has published an interesting pamphlet of his reminiscences of Indian Libraries in which he gives useful information about the important Libraries now existing in this country. In the course of his speech the Gaekwar referred to the difficulty arising in India owing to multiplicity of languages.

Communal Economics:—Mr. K. L. Gauba, Muslim representative in the Legislative Assembly, has issued an exhortation to his community to 'Buy Muslim' in principle. In supporting his appeal, The Eastern Times of Lahore remarks that Hindus have followed a policy of 'Buy Hindu' from "time immemorial." It writes, "Their doctrine of pollution by touch, if it be not based on the boycott of others, has practically the same effect. It inculcates a hatred of non-Hindus leading Hindus to boycott, if possible, even the non-food articles manufactured or sold by non-Hindus. This tendency has become more pronounced among them in recent years when some of them have taken to trading even in boots and shoes made of cowhide." The Eastern Times apparently does not know that "the doctrine of pollution" cannot be a matter of conviction to those Hindus who have entered into the trade in cowhide. Mr. Gauba, himself a recent convert from Hinduism, fully realises, we are sure, the impossibility of retaining the communities in water-tight compartments.

Italians in India:—We have referred in these columns to the activities of "The Italian Community in India," an organisation formed in Calcutta for Italian propaganda in this country. The fact that the association operates from a post-box number and has not disclosed the names of its prime movers is doing it as much harm as the methods of propaganda it has adopted. In a recent circular newsheet it expressed its disapproval of the anti-Italian articles of an Allahabad lawyer and concluded with the vague remark that he would hear from the organisation. A press report now declares that a series of circulars have reached the Allahabad High Court Bar Association from "The Italian Community." If that body really desires to promote a better understanding of Italy, we trust it will drop its present anonymity. The public in India are entitled to judge for themselves the strength of the claim of the newly formed Calcutta association to speak for Italians resident in India.

Foreign Propaganda:—A friend writes: "Mr. Subhas Bose seems to give away his whole case when he says in his statement on Indian Propaganda Abroad (Reformer, August 10) that China was unable fully to utilise the worldwide sympathy she had secured by her steady and continuous propaganda, because of her military weakness. Czechoslovakia succeeded because her revolutionary leaders who carried on propaganda offered the services of the several thousand Czech soldiers who had surrendered from the Imperial Austrian Army and became technically prisoners of war in Russia, first to the Tsar, then to the Soviet, and then to the Allies. On the other hand, the French and Soviet Revolutions, which changed the face of European politics, were achieved in the teeth of opposition from all Europe. It would thus seem that propaganda is of small use unless backed up by more substantial factors."

Anti-Semitic Issue in South Africa:—Mr. Manilal Gandhi writes in India Opinion:—"Ever since the Anti-Semitic movement started in Germany the Greyshirt movement has been inaugurated in South Africa, whose object is to eliminate the Jews from this country. One distressing thing to which our notice has been drawn is that the Greyshirts have been going to Indians for financial help to carry on their movement and that in some parts of the Transvaal such help has been readily given by our brethren. We have been authoritatively informed, further, that a representative of the Greyshirts has come to Durban for the express purpose of collecting funds from the local Indian Community. The openly declared policy of the South African National Party, with which this movement is incorporated, is to extend the laws dealing with the repatriation of Asiatics. We are fully aware of the fact that the experience of the Indian community of the Jews as a part of the ruling race in this country has been none too happy, but vindictiveness is an evil which we would certainly not encourage in our own community. We should view the matter from higher considerations based on moral principles. We have no doubt that the Greyshirt movement against the Jews is wholly unjust and unholy and our sympathy and support, whether it be moral or active, should therefore be entirely with the Jews and not with the Greyshirts."

[Sept. 7

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER BOMBAY, September, 7 1935.

AMERICA IN AFRICA.

The Italo-Ethiopian dispute took a dramatic turn last week-end. A Reuter's message from Addis Ababa of the 30th August gave the gloomiest picture published till then of the military unpreparedness of Ethiopia to meet an Italian invasion. It is believed, it stated, that the troops whose morale was excellent, possessed ammunition sufficient only for three days' battle on modern lines. As all previous information was to the effect that the defence which the country was in a position to make, assisted by geographical and climatic conditions, would make the task of Italy extremely arduous, the message gave rise to the impression that a great power was manoeuvring to put pressure on the Emperor to concede all the demands of Italy on the ground that his chances of success in a conflict were negligible. On Monday, therefore, the world was surprised to learn that the Emperor had granted extensive concession to an Anglo-American group to exploit the valuable natural resources of his country, specially in the areas adjoining Italian Somaliland. All knowledge of this concession was promptly denied by the British Foreign Office which was bound by an old pre-war treaty to act in consultation with France and Italy in matters connected with the exploitation of Abyssinia. But Abyssinia was not a party to this treaty to dispose of her future. She had not even been consulted about it. With equal reason, Japan, the Hedjaz and Persia could have entered into a treaty regarding the future disposition of Great Britain. European statesmen, however, have always acted on the assumption that the destiny of coloured races was exclusively their concern. Fortunately for Ethiopia, the United States was not involved in this European conspiracy. It was not bound by this treaty. Yet the American company which had secured the concession has, it is reported, withdrawn from the deal on the very eve of the League meeting. What happened behind the scenes will not be known for some time.

It is clear that Italy was totally unaware of the Ethiopian negotiations with the Americans till the conclusion of the deal. Two months ago, President Roosevelt had given a reply to the Emperor's appeal for his good offices in the impending struggle, which was generally interpreted as a blank refusal. More recently Signor Mussolini publicly held up the United States as an example for other Powers to follow in the dispute between Italy and Abyssinia. The Italian Press was so convinced of the uninterestedness of America, that it condemned the concession when it became known, as the outcome of British machination. But it was later stated that no British capital was behind the transaction and that it was cent per cent American. Capital has no country and one need not take this denial too literally. The American Government had also announced that the concession to American capitalists would make no difference as regards its neutrality policy. The interpretation placed on President Roosevelt's reply to the Ethiopian Emperor's appeal by the European Press was flatly contradicted by the New Republic (July 17). "Despite its oblique diplomatic language," it observed, "the note was a direct slap at Mussolini and Italy's imperial ambitions. According to trustworthy sources, Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Hull are greatly concerned about the impending conflict, and are reported to be in secret consultation with the British Government over possible means of stopping it. The only recent concession of importance granted by Haile Selassie, that for damming Lake Tsana, is held by an American Engineering Company, and is looked upon with great solicitude by our State Department. The Department also shares the general opinion that Mussolini is preparing to take a bigger bite than he can comfortably chew." The American withdrawal from the latest concession to its nationals is an act of self-abnegation which is bound to enhance her moral influence in shaping the course of future events.

The concession to exploit the oil and mineral resources, said to be immense, of Abyssinia, recalls in its effect on world opinion the purchase overnight of the Khedive Ismail's shares in the Suez Canal Company by Disraeli, then British Prime Minister. The purchase of the Suez Canal shares gave Britain a firm foothold in Egyptian politics and the Ethiopian concession to the American Syndicate, though given up on the eve of the League of Nations meeting at Geneva to adjudicate between the Italian wolf and the Abyssinian lamb, gives the United States a voice in determining the fortunes of that country. The association of the wolf with Italy is a compliment to the legend of the founders of Rome having been suckled by a she-wolf. Students of ethnology will note that the deep-rooted rivalry between Anglo-Saxon and Latin has found historic expression in Ethiopia as it did in Egypt. The parallel may be carried further. Kitchener's campaign against Soudan was in all essentials an anticipation of the Mussolinian plans for the conquest of Abyssinia. The fight between the Khalifa and Kitchener was a contest between personal bravery and the magazine gun. The fight between Mussolini and Haile Selassie is also between personal bravery on the one side and poison gas, chemicals to burn unshod Ethiopian feet and the death-ray which Marconi is said to have placed at the service of Il Duce. But there is one difference. There was no world opinion in 1897. There was no League of Nations. Their existence today seems to make no difference. But it does make a difference and a very important one. It shows that humanity is shedding its predatory mentality and that international relations are beginning to be conceived in an ethical as opposed to the biological spirit. There is hope for the future.

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

FORTY-FIVE YEARS.

A very eminent Indian recently observed that the strength of the social reformers could not have effected the passing of the Sarda Act. This is true to a large extent if strength means numerical strength. But the strength of social reform was never that of numbers or material resources. It was the strength of ideas; and numbers and material resources always surrender to the power of ideas. "Take your stand on a great idea," wrote Emerson. "All the world will come round to you." Mr. Har Bilas Sarda, the author of the Act, was himself not a very prominent figure in the social reform movement. The majority of members who voted for the Sarda Bill in the Legislative Assembly and the Council of State were not people who had taken an active part in social reform associations or Conferences. The Act could not have been passed without the support of the Government in the two Houses and without the assent of the Governor-General. This would certainly have not been accorded, if it had not been plain beyond doubt that restraint on child-marriages had a large body of support in the country. Social reformers were always few but their ideas had permeated the great mass of intelligent opinion. Politically minded India had been converted from opposition to support of marriage reform. The process of this transformation can be studied in the pages of the Indian Social Reformer which completed forty five-years with the last issue and begins its forty-sixth volume today.

The first issue of the Reformer was published on the 7th September 1890 in Madras. The National Social Conference had been started two years before. Previous to that, there were individuals of high character carrying on propaganda in some parts of the country. The Brahmo Samaj in Bengal and the Arya Samaj in the Punjab were primarily religious reform movements. In Bombay and Madras social reform which in its early days meant chiefly the overthrow of the restriction on the remarriage of widows, was advocated as having the sanction of the Shastras. The leaders were endeavouring to change the mind of the people as the first and most necessary step to change the custom which they followed. They themselves shrank from breaking the custom before society was ready to follow their lead. Dewan Bahadur Raghunath Rao published innumerable tracts and pamphlets in Sanskrit, English and the vernaculars to show that the remarriage of widows was completely in accord with the Shastras. But he would not sit at meals with a remarried couple. That was in Madras. In Bombay, Ranade, who was not orthodox like his Madras compeer, went through a form of prayaschit for having taken tea at the house of a missionary. Opponents of social reform twitted him for not having married a widow when the death of his first wife gave him the opportunity of putting into practice his opinion in favour of the reform. Ranade's friend and fellow-worker Telang, got his daughter married at a tender age to the delight of the orthodox and the discomfiture of reformers. These men were not lacking in moral courage. They felt that the time was not ripe for action. They would prefer to go two steps taking the people with them to striding forward ten leaving the latter behind. When the Reformer was started in 1890, with its stress on rational and practical methods, personal example being the most important, it was from Bombay and from these friends that the most generous encouragement greeted the small unknown group which conceived and acted on the idea of a journal primarily devoted to the advocacy of social reform. It was in the nature of things, therefore, that ten years later the Reformer should have found its home in Bombay.

The Reformer was started amidst the throes of the agitation which followed the introduction of the first Age of Consent Bill. Its immediate purpose was to save the Hindu newspaper from a serious crisis due to disagreement between Editor, Subrahmanya Iyer, and Manager, Viraraghava Charyar, on the policy to be adopted toward social reform. The late Mr. K. Subba Row, then Assistant Editor of the Hindu, and one of the founders of the Reformer has told the story in his "Revived Memories" published shortly before his death three years ago. "Mr. Viraraghava Charyar," he wrote, "was in a sense the direct and the immediate cause of the birth in the journalistic fraternity of that promising and unique child, the Indian Social Reformer. One day he called me aside and for about two hours explained to me the difficulties he had to contend in the management of the Hindu. While he was found fault with by G. Subrahmanya Iyer for the financial embarrassment in which they found themselves often, Viraraghava Charyar explained it was a great deal due to the changed policy of the Editor and he put it to me plainly that by, my throwing in my lot with him completely, I had strengthened the hands of G. Subrahmanya Iyer and weakened his own. He wanted an assurance from me and my friends that we would not utilise the columns of the Hindu almost exclusively—in his view—for the propagation of our pet theories and he appealed to me in all earnestness to save him from the apprehension he had strongly entertained, that if we were more amenable to him the concern would improve and he would command more peace of mind. I at once assented and had a sleepless night. I confided in two or three friends and they fell in with my view that a separate weekly paper, solely devoted to social and moral reforms, should be immediately started." There was no strength of men or money behind this bold venture. That it has lived to complete its forty-fifth year, is another proof that the strength of a movement is the strength of the ideas underlying it. As a matter of fact Viraraghava Charya was wrong. The Hindu's difficulties were not really due to its social reform writings but to other causes as events showed.

One more instance may be cited. More distressing even than the lot of child widows was that of the girls dedicated to temple service, known as devadasis. The institution originally represented the noble idea that all knowledge, all art, all human activity, should find its consummation in God. A leading article in the Reformer headed "Is She Not a Woman and A Sister?" started what was then called the anti-nautch movement. Surprising as it seems at the present day, this movement excited bitter opposition. Mr. K. Subba Row in his delightful book of reminiscences has given some idea of it. He writes: "The handful of us who stood in the front ranks of the agitation came in for a great deal of opprobrium and ridicule. For the ardent lovers of the nautch system, no abuse was vile enough, no vindictive terms strong enough for application against us and our Association. We were charged with the high crime of attempting to kill the fine arts of music and dancing. We were depicted as too impotent to appreciate feminine charms associated with a free life of untrammelled license. Even the most educated and highly placed men shrugged their shoulders at our (in their opinion scandalous also) unpatriotic diversion of public movements to so sordid a matter and our attention was called to the Divorce Courts of Europe and to their theatres and dancing saloons. Leaders of reactionary Indian thought, in a truly saintly spirit and with that spark of divine compassion which pities the follies of erring humanity, informed us that there should be a recognised outlet for human passions and that otherwise family life in the Hindu social strata would be placed amidst unthinkable and unutterable dangers. But we heeded not." This movement initiated in such unpropitious conditions has steadily made its way and within the last few years laws have been passed against dedication of women in Madras, Mysore and Bombay. Here again it was not the strength of the reformers but the strength of the idea which counted. Legislation for raising the marriage age, full facilities for education of women at all stages, the abolition of caste and the removal of untouchability, were all taken up and action urged even in these early years. Social reform was greatly handicapped by the absence of machinery to give effect to the new ideas in the political and administrative system. The Montagu-Chelmsford Reforms opened the door slightly, and there has been a rush of Bills seeking legislative sanction for social reforms.

Twice in my long connection with the Reformer, I had thought that it was at an end. The first was when I came to Bombay in November 1898. The paper remained behind in charge of friends. But not for long. In a year they told me that it was too much of a burden and asked to be relieved. By a turn of events, I found myself free to resume charge of it and it came here. The second time was twenty years ago. A domestic calamity left me without confidence in my strength to carry on with the paper. I wrote out a notice and had just sent it out when Sir Narayan Chandavarkar walked in. I told him what I had done. He at once recalled it and wrote the leader for that week's paper. He had been a staunch friend of the paper from the start and would not bear of its being stopped. Patent is the word in season. Next week I was myself again.

THE NEW MARRIAGE BILL.

Dr. Bhagawandas's proposed enactment for validating Intercaste-Marriages will certainly be more acceptable to the sentiment of Hindus who may wish to intermarry after it becomes law than Dr. Gour's Special Marriage Amendment Act of 1923. Its advantage lies in the simple fact that it calls for no innovation in procedure, carries with it no air of dispensing with religious ministration, and creates no new legal consequences except the one which the parties have set their hearts upon, namely, the validation of their marriage. Whatever treatment such couples may get socially from their respective families and communities, they can at least have the satisfaction of feeling that they have not been guilty of voluntarily straying from the beaten track a single inch beyond what was absolutely necessary to achieve their immediate purpose and that they have not had to adopt for the sake of the marriage any new ceremonial or family law which may seem to mark them off as a class apart from their kith and kin.

It is doubtful if Dr. Bhagawandas can afford to mar the happy simplicity of his Bill by introducing the principle of monogamy, as some reformers may desire, into the family law that should govern the mixed couples under his Act. We wonder if he can venture even to revive the ancient Hindu rule that no man who has a wife living can validly take to himself a second wife except with the former's free and express consent. If not, can he at least give the first wife the freedom to live apart from her husband and claim separate maintenance? If he fails to give any such reliefs we may be sure that not only will the Hindu wife of equal caste with her husband stand in jeopardy of being superseded and subordinated in her own home against her will by a co-wife of lower caste, but the latter too will often find when too late that inherent danger to the stability of her happiness is far greater than that to which those who marry according to caste rules are ordinarily subject in the present state of Hindu society. The fate of a high-caste woman after she cuts herself off wilfully from the sympathy and support of her people by marrying beneath her rank will naturally be far more precarious. At all events it is premature now to speculate if Dr. Bhagawandas's new enactment will be a happy substitute for Dr. Gour's Act of 1923, whether or not we include among the Hindu castes those who are Buddhists, Sikhs or Jains, of whom the last two are recognised as Hindus by our law courts and all the three are accepted as members by the Hindu Maha Sabha. Pandit Iswar Chandra Vidyasagar achieved his crown of glory with the simple validation of Hindu widow marriages. But he lived long enough thereafter to feel it a crown of thorns. Much depends upon the personal interest one may take in the practical results of a well-intentioned legislation.

We are by no means inclined to belittle the usefulness of Dr. Bhagawandas's Bill, even as it stands, in facilitating intercaste marriages. One class of such marriages is already held to be valid under the present Hindu law by the Bombay and Madras High Courts. It is the one called Anuloma in which the bridegroom is of a caste higher than that of the bride (see A. I. R. 1922 Bombay 32; 1928 Madras 1279.) But few people outside legal circles are aware of this fact even in these provinces. And no Indian High Court has as yet held the converse variety, in which the bride's caste is superior, to be valid. In fact the very text of the Shashtra which enabled Justice Lalubhai Shah in 1922 to uphold the validity of Anuloma marriages, condemns Pratiloma marriages in unmistakable terms. But Justice Venkatasubbarao who followed the Bombay view in favour of Anuloma marriages has also recorded an express warning that he 'should not be understood as saying that Pratiloma marriages are invalid,' as held by Justice Chandavarkar in 1912. (Vide I. L. R. 46 Bombay 871). There is evidently fair room still for the belief that what is deprecated or even condemned by the smritis need not necessarily be pronounced invalid in law. Social reformers cannot but feel happy and thankful if the pre-eminent erudition and unquestionable devotion to ancient Hindu ideals for which Dr. Bhagawandas is universally venerated, succeed in dissolving all orthodox and Governmental prejudices and enable him to place his Bill on the Statute Book.

But while we wish every success to the new Bill, we feel we cannot afford to see more faults in Dr. Gour's Act of 1923 than it does actually possess. It is unfortunately true that it has been overlaid with some scarecrow provisions, presumably to placate orthodox sentiment which loves to see reformers as well as social innovators and other caste offenders put as far as possible outside the Hindu pale. These provisions are in truth either harmless or positively good to the marrying couples themselves without causing injustice to any others. But they are undoubtedly playing the enemy's game and scaring away young men from availing themselves of the Act as freely as they might otherwise do for ordinary caste marriages for which it is eminently valuable though it was not designed mainly for that purpose.

Of late, however, a new prejudice seems to have cropped up in a different quarter. A suspicion has evidently gained ground in the minds of friends who are otherwise well disposed towards it that it is somehow working inequitably towards the orthodox members of a Hindu joint family. It seems to be supposed that a person marrying under the Act of 1923 gets an undue advantage over the other members of his family, because it provides that as an automatic result of such marriage he shall be deemed in law to be divided from the rest of his coparceners. This view has found expression in an editorial note on "Marriage and Succession," in the Reformer of 3rd August 1935. Dr. Gour's observation that "the Amendment was made to enlarge the rights of persons by giving them the advantage of the English law of succession and at the same time by removing the incubus of joint family obligations," has been thought to lend corroboration to this belief. And it has been urged that a new enactment is called for in the interests of justice because, "where there is ancestral property to divide, and the man who marries out of his group against the opposition of his parents wishes to have his share, he should take it subject to the obligations to which he would be ordinarily liable." The implication clearly is that the Gour Act not only helps the self-willed son to marry in defiance of his elders and breaks up their family by creating a legal division for him but also robs them of some of their just rights and makes a free present thereof to the prodigal. It is worthwhile, examining, therefore, whether such an apprehension is well grounded in fact.

The natural instinctive tendency of Hindus as a race is of course to stick to the parent stock and hang together in as large bunches as possible until driven by bitter experience and sad necessity to break up into more manageable and congenial units. That is why Section 23 of the Gour Act is operating as a scare-crow to young men who would like to use it ordinarily for caste-marriages but hate to forego the warmth of the parental nest or seem desirous of abandoning it. But the Hindu social conscience does not reprobate separation as heinous or immoral. It appreciates the practical discomforts and occasional inequities that not unoften mar joint family life in modern conditions. Although it may affect to shed a sentimental tear over the departed beauty and glory of the united Hindu home whenever a division occurs, it accepts it philosophically as inevitable and even good for all concerned in view of the circumstances of each case. The great ancient Hindu law-giver, Manu himself, gave the legal right of separation to every Hindu and even commended family division as meritorious on the ground that it multiplies religious rites because each of the dividing members would thereafter have to perform a separate ceremony on solemn domestic occasions for which a single ceremony sufficed for all when they had a joint household. The Gour Act did nothing more than to declare that the age-long right which every Hindu, married or unmarried, admittedly possesses under the Hindu law to have his share of family assets and liabilities determined at any moment he may choose, shall be deemed to have been exercised by him at the moment he chose to marry by registration under the Act, although he may not utter a word about separation from the joint family and may continue to live under the joint roof and eat from the joint kitchen, if the other members made no objection, without asking for actual partition of property. There is wisdom in this provision. It avoids unseemly squabbles and protects the new couple from much annoyance and harm (vide the Reformer of 15th June 1929 page 660 and also of 22nd November 1930 page 189). But above all, it does an act of kindness to the orthodox kinsmen themselves. Community of caste is the sine qua non of joint family life in Hindu society. When a heterogeneous element is introduced in the shape of a daughter-in-law of a different caste, whether high or low, that family cannot hold together comfortably for long and the sooner it is dissolved and the incompatible members are left free to form their own separate home the better for the happiness of all parties, more especially of the orthodox members who set great store by the purity of their castes. The Gour Act therefore deserves their gratitude, not reprobation, for imposing automatically a divided status on its protegee without the unpleasantness of immediate division by metes and bounds.

JANE ADDAMS.

Miss Jane Addams, world-famous social welfare worker and peace advocate, died at 6-15 p. m. on May 21st 1935 in Passavant Hospital, Chicago, where she had undergone a major operation four days earlier.

The founder of Hull House, internationally known social settlement in Chicago, and the winner of a Nobel Prize for her efforts in behalf of world peace, Miss Addams would have been 75 years old on September 6.

Miss Addams has been called "the greatest woman in the world," the "mother of social service," "the greatest woman internationalist" and the "first citizen of Chicago." With her idealism, serene, unafraid, militant, was always paramount. Devoted to the cause of social and political reform, to the betterment of the economic condition of the masses, to world peace and to internationalism, Miss Addams's influence was world-wide. She was, perhaps, the world's best-known and best-loved woman.

She made enemies. Her views were sometimes considered dangerously radical. Socialists and other radicals met at Hull House, and her opponents sometimes forgot that her liberal attitude in permitting such meetings did not include a membership in the groups she tolerated. In the World War her efforts for peace were unabated even when the United States entered the struggle and the war-time hysteria which ensued obscured for a time the American public's realization of Miss Addams's purity of purpose and character.

World peace was forever dear to her heart, and from the time of the war she became more and more active in its behalf. But she did not ignore other causes. Lavishly she gave of her self to fight child labour, to lead political causes such as those of Colonel Roosevelt and the Progressive party in 1912 and of Senator La Follette and his Progressives of 1924, to battle for disarmament, for insurance against unemployment, old age and poverty, for woman suffrage and for equal rights of women. But she never left Hull House, her starting place, and remained as its resident head until her death.

She lectured from end to end of the United States. All over Europe and Asia she travelled, everywhere striving to alleviate the suffering of the masses, everywhere serene, helpful, capable, dauntless. She wrote many books. In each she pledged herself anew to fight for justice as she saw it.

Miss Addams was born in Cedarville, Ill., on September 6, 1860, of Quaker ancestry. Had she chosen it, this woman who gave herself so unselfishly to the cause of the poor, the ignorant and the oppressed, could have enjoyed wealth and social position.

Her father, John H. Addams, a friend of Abraham Lincoln, was a banker, who served from 1854 to 1870 in the Illinois Senate. Lincoln's creed of the equality of men became Miss Addams's ideal as a child.

In one of her books Miss Addams wrote: "My father always spoke of the martyred President as Mr. Lincoln, and I never heard the great name without a thrill. I remember the day—it must have been one of comparative leisure, perhaps a Sunday—at my request my father took out of his desk a thin packet marked, 'Mr. Lincoln's Letters', the shortest one of which bore unmistakable traces of that remarkable personality. These letters began, "my dear Double D—ed Addams," and to the inquiry as to how the person thus addressed was about to vote on a certain measure then before the Legislature was added the assurance that he knew this Addam "would vote according to his conscience."

As a child, Miss Addams regarded herself as an ugly duckling. She said she was pigeon-toed and twisted in the back so that her head leaned slightly to one side and she didn't want to have any one know she was the daughter of so fine a man as her father. But surgery cured her deformities and she became a young woman described as "beautiful, not pretty," "beautiful" because of her remarkable expression.

She became, too, graceful, erect, with a fine carriage. After she was graduated from Rockford College in 1881, Miss Addams went abroad to complete her education. It was not the Alps, the art galleries or the cathedrals that impressed her, but rather the slums of the great cities. More than ever she was determined to dedicate her life to service of the poor.

She went to London and there saw Toyabee Hall, the first settlement house in the world. She was greatly impressed, as she was by the European slums she visited. Returning to the United States, she was ill for some months, and then, in 1888, she studied for a time in Philadelphia.

In 1889, when she was 29 old, Miss Addams and Miss Ellen Gates Starr, her friend, founded Hull House at 800, South Halsted Street, Chicago. "In the midst of horrid little houses" of the slums. Four years previously the stately red brick mansion had been built by Charles J. Hull on the outskirts of the city. By 1889, however, it stood in the heart of one of the most miserable neighbourhoods of the city. The owner, Miss Helen Culver, gave the two women a free leasehold to the house and later to the land about it, on which twelve additional buildings were built.

Miss Addams moved into Hull House in September, 1889, and it was her home thereafter. It was then between a saloon and an undertaking shop, and there was an annex to a factory in its rear. Thousands of the foreign born—Miss Addams always held welcoming arms to the strangers—including Poles, Jews, Russians, Italians, Greeks, Germans, Irish, Indians and Bohemians, were welcomed there.

Hull House grew to be known as one of the largest and best-known of the nation's settlements. It commenced with the ordinary activities of children's clubs and free kindergartens, and later it sponsored courses in languages, literature, music, painting, history, mathematics, elocution, dancing, wood-carving, pottery, metal work, bookbinding, dress making, lacework, cooking and basketwork. A labour museum was also established at Hull House.

Dozens of clubs were organized to aid working women. A lunch room was opened, as was a nursery for the children of employed women. There was also a gymnasium, a natatorium, a penny savings bank, a lodging house, as well as a circulating library and an employment bureau. Miss Addams personally directed all these activities, which were models for hundreds of others throughout the world.

She also became known for her work in the neighbourhood, the Nineteenth Ward. So disturbed was she by the condition of the streets in the ward that she obtained the post of Garbage Inspector, which she filled with her characteristic successful thoroughness for three years, until, as she later explained, a politician coveted it for one of his henchmen.

She was early concerned with the welfare of young women who had been led astray or abandoned. She cared for them, for their children, and fought for better conditions for all unfortunate women. The social evil, she once said, made $ 15,000,000 yearly profit for vice panderers, and she blamed much of this evil on the cold attitude of the church, the "good" women, and on the laws which, she said, often were unfair to women, and far too lenient toward their male oppressors.

In 1909 Miss Addams became president of the National Conference of Charities and Corrections, and served in that post with distinction. Her fight for world peace began early. She had an abhorrence for bloodshed and violence. In January, 1915, when the Woman's Peace Party was organized, she was chosen president.

In April, 1915, she helped to organize and became president of the Woman's International League for Peace and Freedom, then called the Woman's International Peace Congress, which she headed until 1929, when she became honorary international president. The first meeting, held in April, 1915, at The Hague, was, in many respects, a stormy one, as it was attended by women from all of the warring countries, as well as most of the neutral ones.

After the conference Miss Addams toured Europe in an effort to persuade the heads of the belligerent nations to make peace. But she found that the war spirit was dominant. The movement for a conference to offer continuous mediation, which she backed, was checked by the refusal of President Wilson to move in the matter.

She was horrified at the sinking of the Lusitania, but said that "talk of reprisal and aggression can only increase the spirit of bitterness." She opposed going to war over the case, and continued to co-operate with those who wanted to stop the war.

After the war declaration in April, 1917, she met measures for strengthening of the blockade of the Central Powers with the declaration that the United States "should not allow the women and children of any nation to starve." She declared later that "the feelings of German-born Americans should have been considered before the United States entered the war."

She was never accused of being pro-German, but was much criticized for her pacifism. After the war she presided at international conferences of the league in Zurich in 1919, in Vienna in 1921, in The Hague in 1922, in Washington in 1924, in Dublin in 1926, and at Prague in 1929. Always in her peace work she was forward looking. It was noted that in the resolutions adopted at the first conference in 1915, many of President Wilson's Fourteen Points were forecast. In 1924 much opposition was manifested in this country to the conference, to which Miss Addams replied gracefully, without rancor.

She continued to fight for her ideals as the years progressed and often interceded for political prisoners or for persons barred from entry into the United States because of their political or social views. In 1920 she said that a "modification of our ideas of private property is at hand," adding that "nothing is more certain than the imminence of social change." She opposed also secret treaties and advocated entrance of the United States into the League of Nations and endorsed the Pact of Paris and the principles of disarmament.

Of Miss Addams, Professor Halfdan Kott, of the Nobel Prize Committee, said :

New York. P. GOPAL KRISHNAYYA

THE WOMAN WORKER IN EUROPE.

Our upstanding Danish sisters are showing the way to the women of the world in their struggle for the economic emancipation of the woman worker. In Denmark, we are able to meet organised Trade Union women active in their demand that the regulation of work in the interest of the worker shall be the same for men and women, and in their opposition to the special regulation of the work of women which is wrongly called "protection." This support gives new courage. Then, too, we know that Denmark stands almost alone in its successful resistance to the world pressure directed to inducing it to ratify those International Labour Conventions which place special restrictions on women's work. This knowledge gives us new hope that this little Danish heaven will in time leaven the whole world lump. Many enlightened Danish men by their actions show their belief in the justice of the claim that women shall be free to work and protected, as workers, on the same terms as men.

We claim this right for all women, irrespective of marriage, pregnancy, or childbirth. We are not opposed to the regulation of work for the protection of the worker, provided it applies equally to both men and women. For a regulation can only protect the worker if it is based on the nature of the work and not upon the sex of the worker. Nor are we opposed to the provision of help in connection with a child about to be born or recently born, but that is a matter outside the scope of our strictly limited object. It is possible to provide such help without damaging the mother. But it is always wrong to penalise the mother or to restrict her rights as a worker.

It is depressing to have to record that many States are continuing further to curtail the opportunities of the woman worker, both married and unmarried, by special regulations ostensibly imposed in the woman's own interest. At the time of our Prague Conference in 1933 the married woman was already the chief victim of the rapidly extending policy of sacrificing the woman worker in the interest of the male worker by directly prohibiting or curtailing her freedom to work for pay. A most sinister and startling development of the last two years is the spread of this idea that it is justifiable to deprive women of work in the interests of the male worker, the application of this idea to single women, and its acceptance by governments of states claiming to be enlightened and civilised. The idea is seen in its naked ugliness in the many laws and orders intended to reduce the unemployment of men by aggravating that of women. Before our Prague Conference a beginning had already been made in Germany when the permanent appointment of women in Government service before the age of 35 was forbidden. To take other quite recent examples: In Luxembourg, by a Grand Ducal Decree of 14 April, 1934, a special permit is required before a public or private administrative department can appoint a female clerical staff, or retain a woman in employment after marriage.

* Extract from presidential speech delivered at the opening session of the Fourth Conference of the Open Door International for the Economic Emancipation of the Woman Worker at Christiansburg Castle (House of Parliament) Copenhagen, Denmark, 19th-23rd August, 1935.

Yugoslavia, by an Order of 31 March, 1934, has fixed the proportion of women higher grade postal servants at 30 %, intermediate grade at 25 %, and lower grade at 10 %. The Netherlands Minister of the Interior has recommended Local Authorities (Circular dated 19 March, 1934) to replace women by men in posts not specifically requiring female labour. In Germany an Order of August 26, 1934, gives priority of employment to male workers over 40 and to women who have family responsibilities. A German Act of July 8, 1934, forbids married women doctors to practice except when this is absolutely necessary for the maintenance of their families. By another German Order of May 17, 1934, women farm servants and agricultural workers are not allowed to be employed in canning factories, hotels, restaurants and cafes. An Italian legislative decree of November 28, 1933, empowers administrative departments to exclude women or to limit their number, and, under this, percentage limits for women have been fixed at 5 for the higher grade, 15 for the intermediate, and 20 for the lower. In Italy under powers delegated to federations of employers and workers many corporate agreements have been made to restrict the employment of women. There are signs that similar dangerous delegated powers may be given to employers and workers in other countries. Under a circular of the Belgian Council of Ministers August 12, 1934, all posts in public administrative departments, including typists and short hand typists, are to be reserved for men so long as qualified candidates are available.

Another sinister new practice is to delegate to a Minister arbitrary powers to prohibit or to curtail women's employment. Under a Belgian Order of December 8, 1934 the Minister of Social Welfare is empowered to fix a quota of women, married or unmarried, who may be employed in any private industry, trade, or occupation for the whole country or by districts. The Order no doubt is camouflaged in legal dress, but in fact it puts women outside the law. The Minister, in reply to protests, has had the affrontery to seek to justify the order by saying it will be applied with caution, and that women are not to be dismissed where economic working normally depends upon them. A Government Bill now before the Irish Free State Parliament proposes to give a similar power to the Minister of Labour and Commerce to prohibit the employment of women in any form of industrial work, or to fix the proportion of women to be employed by any employer in such work—another example of giving to a Minister arbitrary power over the woman worker.

These arbitrary powers given in Belgium and proposed in Ireland are intended to be exercised for the benefit of men at women's expense by the direct prohibition or curtailment of women's employment. But another type of arbitrary power over women workers now being widely conferred is dangerous in a more insidious way, since it is to be exercised in the making of regulations purporting to be for women's benefit. These usually take the form of a power conferred on a Minister or official to regulate or prohibit women's employment in kinds of work which are not specified, but vaguely described as work which is heavy or dangerous to a women's health or morals. In some cases this power is to be exercised, subject to the submission of each particular order to the Legislature. But in practice, especially where an order directly affects a limited group and no general publicity is given to it, this is a negligible safeguard. Technically women living under such power may be within the rule of law, but in fact they are at the mercy of an arbitrary power with undefined limits. In this sense they are outside the law. Among the countries which have given authority for the exercise of certain of these powers by a Minister or official are Bolivia, Cuba, Estonia, France, Guiana, Poland, Rumania, and Yugoslavia.

The fixing of minimum wage rates and the payment of unemployment, sickness, and other insurance benefits have become integral parts of the wage systems of many countries. Official schemes under which lower rates of pay are fixed for, and lower benefits paid to, women, become powerful machinery for depressing the status of the woman worker. Great Britain is a crying example of both these forms of injustice. In regard to wages there are no blacker spots than the five Australian States (New South Wales, Victoria, Western Australia, South Australia and Tasmania) where by a decision of the full Court of Arbitration of the Commonwealth (June 30, 1933) the basic wage for women was fixed at 52% of that of men.

In some Canadian provinces and in some of the States of the United States of America minimum rates are fixed for women only, with the result that men are replacing women. The International Labour Office (see Year Book 1934-35, page 198), having failed to grasp that this is the natural consequence of special so-called "protective" regulations for women, describes this as "peculiar". And its mental confusion is such that it writes of the women who are losing their jobs as having their wages "protected" and of the men who get the women's jobs as "unprotected" (Year Book 1933 p. 158). Canada by degrees reaches a right solution. First, one Province makes it necessary that a man who replaces a woman should receive the woman's minimum wages. Later, in 1934, five Provinces (Columbia, Manitoba, Ontario, Quebec and Saskatchewan) forbid any male worker to work for a lower wage in work for which a minimum wage is fixed for women, a rule, be it noted, which applies to the nature of the work and not to the sex of the worker. Alas, some provinces now fix minimum rates for men only.

There is little of progress to record. I mention some examples. Lithuania by an Act of November 11, 1933, has released married women from that form of slavery, still, alas, in force in so many ostensibly civilised States, by authorising a married woman to enter industrial employment without her husband's consent. We rejoice with the National Union of Women Teachers, that the London County Council, which deals with a population of some five and a half millions, has just (July 1935) removed the marriage bar, in so far as non-residential work is concerned, from woman teachers and doctors. Unfortunately, however, these women are forbidden to work and put on half-pay for 17 weeks at the time of childbirth. We also congratulate Belgian primary school teachers that their new salary scale is based on equality between the sexes (Royal Order of June 8, 1935); and the women of Queensland on Miss Laracy's successful appeal against the promotion of a male official over her head.

Among recent events which show some advance and some retrogression are the adoption of the new constitution in Brazil (July 16, 1934) and the agreement between Colombia and Peru (Protocol of May 23, 1934). Each of these provides for equal pay for equal work without distinction of sex. The former also provides for the admission to the public service without distinction of sex or marriage. Unfortunately the Brazil constitution prohibits unhealthy work to women only and the Colombia-Peru agreement proposes that health and safety regulations should vary with sex. The Brazil Constitution, too, contains another dangerous proposal that there shall be prescribed for the woman before and after childbirth a "period of rest" this being the usual euphemism for depriving a woman of her right to work for pay in her usual occupation.

News from Russia which is sometimes long in reaching the outside world is both good and bad. For some years the Government there has given special attention to equipping women by education, technical training and opportunities to work for skilled and managerial posts. But, alas, the common belief that work there is open to women on the same terms as men is not the law. An Order of May 17, 1930, one of the most recent quoted in the International Labour Office Legislative Series, prohibits the employment of women in 79 occupations and, so far as I know, has not been repealed. The prohibited occupations include work underground which is evidently not enforced for I have recent firsthand information of strong healthy women miners working in the Donetz basin. Other prohibited occupations are certain work in metals and in dangerous chemicals and many jobs on railways and in ships. It is tragic that the present Russian regime which in so many ways leads the world in regard to women's work, should sink back to the level of countries following an unjust tradition.

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

In the current issue of the Reformer you express surprise at Lord Birkenhead's offer of liquor to Mr. Patel.

Not long ago you published, without criticism, an article from an Indian in England deploring the quiet life which Indian lady students led in London. He suggested that our lady students should follow the examples of a certain class of English women (working class women, as I could judge from the tone of the article) who get in and jump out of tram cars in motion, and indulge in wine drinking.

The Indian members of the first Round Table Conference gave the European members a dinner at which liquor of every description flowed freely. The London correspondent of the Calcutta Statesman, describing that dinner, stated "better wine was never drunk before."

Lord Birkenhead knew little and cared less about India, and his offer of wine to any Indian deserves no censure. Compare Lord Birkenhead's experience with that of another Secretary of State for India, Mr. Montagu who knew, loved and respected India. Mr. Montagu must have been greatly surprised when a Maharajah entertained him at a dinner in his own palace, "defending his (Maharajah's) drinking liquor because it was not the sort of liquor mentioned in the laws of Manu." (Mr. Montagu's Indian Diary, p. 298.)

I think the majority of Indian visitors to England and at public entertainments in India itself do not generally object to accepting drinks, if only "for a change." Had it been otherwise, liquor traffic would not have flourished so long in India, in spite of European support.

To the Europeans, with some exceptions, drink is an article of food, while it is strictly forbidden to all Indians. Your comments may convey the impression that you watch the European conduct in respect of drinking, with the eyes of an Argus, keeping your eyes closed like Kumbhakarna's when

Yours, etc.,
M. G. JOSEPH.

[Mr. Joseph has not understood our point. It was that the Secretary of State for India whose business was to keep in touch with important currents of Indian thought and life, knew less of it in this case than the German professor who expected a restaurant waiter to know that the religions of India prohibited alcoholic drinks. In publishing the article on Indian lady students abroad to which he refers, we expressed our dissent from it in an editorial note (May 27, 1933.) As regards the Round Table Conference and Prohibition, our correspondent will find it he turns the index references to the subject in several places. The Reformer stands for Prohibition and we do not understand Mr. Joseph's criticism that we do not seem to concern ourselves with drink among Indians.—Ed., I.S.R.]

THE RELIGION OF MR. H. G. WELLS.

The Editor,
The Indian Social Reformer.
Dear Sir,

In "Indian Social Reformer" of the 10th inst., there appears an article under heading "Is Modern Intelligence Outgrowing God? Answers by eminent scientists and other thinkers," written by Mr. J. T. Sunderland. Quotations from the writings of eminent scientists and thinkers are given in it. One of these is attributed to Mr. H. G. Wells, from which one is led to conclude that this eminent writer of international fame is a firm and convinced believer in the existence of God. Being in a small way a student of H. G. Wells, I find myself in the position of one attempting to fit square pegs in round holes.

In one of his earlier works, "First and Last Things," Wells dismisses the idea that life is chaotic and believes in a scheme, which, as a whole, he says, he does not clearly know. He writes, "I use the word scheme because it is the best word available, but I strain it in using it. I do not wish to imply a schemer but only order and co-ordination as distinguished from haphazard." He then tries to associate the name of God with this scheme and adds, "The run of people nowadays mean something more and something different when they say God. They intend a personality exterior to them and limited, and they will instantly conclude I mean the same thing." About Christ he says in the same work, "I hope I shall offend no susceptibilities when I assert that this great and very definite personality in the hearts and imagination of mankind does not and never has attracted me. It is a fact I record about myself without aggression or regret." In his "Experiments in Autobiography," recently published, he explains more clearly his attitude towards religion. His scepticism appears to be manifest from early boyhood, though his mother, for whom he had deep affection, was very religious. To her repeated entreaties to him to be conformed, he would demonstrate that he was an atheist. In the Chapter, "Early Adolescence," he describes with pathetic fervour the ordeal he had to undergo, when at the age of seventeen he was required to be confirmed a member of the Church of England as a condition precedent to his being appointed a teacher in the Midhurst Grammar School. "I did something that wounded my private honour very deeply..... If, I refused, the whole burden of the situation would fall on my mother." Later on in the same work he openly admits that, like Bernard Shaw, he too is an atheist and a socialist. Lastly in that monumental work, "The Science of Life," written jointly with Julian Huxley and G. P. Wells, there is a break, if not a reversal, from his earlier views on life. The conception of "scheme" behind evolution is abandoned. He rejects summarily the "Life Force" of Shaw and the "elan vital" of Bergson. "Bergson and Shaw in common with many others have been so much impressed with the apparent purpose revealed in the slow stupendous drama of life, that they have not hesitated to make purpose the key of evolution." The process of evolution, according to the authors, is "the result of purposeless and random variation sifted by purposeless and automatic selection.....When we reach man, evolution does in part become purposeful.....Human purpose is one of the achievements of evolution."

Does Mr. Wells betray a glaring inconsistency in his thinking or does the author of the article, in his exuberance of enthusiasm, wrongly attribute the quotation to Mr. Wells? Perhaps Mr. Sunderland himself will answer the question.

A DIRECTORY OF WOMEN'S ORGANISATION.

It is proposed to prepare a directory furnishing reliable facts about all the organisations working for the cause of women in Bombay, Gujarat and Kathiawar.

We are passing through an age of transition. The whole world is being rapidly transformed. New nations are coming to the fore, and India too is awakening from its slumber. With the awakening of women in India, the heart of the nation has begun to pulsate with new life and the Indian woman has determined to give new life and vigour to the body politic. The determination is being achieved by means of organisations which are fast multiplying and the preparation of the Directory is undertaken in order that these institutions may be able to co-operate amongst themselves and thereby utilise their energies to the best possible advantage.

There are countless funds for charitable purposes lying idle, and at the same time the good work the women's organisations have been doing is not adequately known among the public chiefly due to the lack of a complete Directory. It is, therefore, intended to supply the long-felt want; so that persons connected with the management of these institutions may be able to get information about the objects and the activities, etc., of the sister institutions working in different parts of the province. In order that the compilation may be useful to all—whether a student of social problems, or a worker in the field, or a person interested in getting benefit of these institutions—it is proposed to make the work as comprehensive as possible.

I have, therefore, to seek the co-operation of each and every worker of women organisations. I also trust that they will furnish all the necessary data, and favour me with their views. I am sending out a questionnaire which I hope will be duly returned with full answers. I shall also be obliged if the organisations favour me with copies of their annual reports.

Any information concerning any organisation, its activities and the names of persons connected with them will be greatly appreciated.

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

THE GERMAN BILL TO PROMOTE MARRIAGE.

(CONTRIBUTED)

With the Bill to promote marriage introduced on July 1st 1933 the Reich made an attempt to inhibit the unfavourable politico-racial development and prepare the way for an upward movement of national energy. Now, two years later, its effects can already be felt, offering interesting evidence to the difficult problem so frequently viewed sceptically by leading social workers as to whether and how far politico-racial developments can be determined or influenced by Government motions.

The Bill originally contained three distinct Sections:-

(1) A bachelor tax levied in the form of 2 to 5% increase in income tax on those unmarried and without issue.

(2) A marriage subsidy of from 600 to 1,000 marks given as a non-interest bearing, long-term loan to healthy and deserving couples.

And, finally, a maternity bonus in the form of a 25% remission as well as suspension or amortisation of payments of the marriage loan for 12 months for each healthy child born. Incidentally, these loans were intended to help the furniture and textile industries which at that time were experiencing difficulties and, furthermore, as an alleviation of the female labour market, and are secured in every direction by special regulations. Since that time there has been an amendment, 50 million marks were taken from the special fund available for marriage subsidies and earmarked for last mortgages on separate small houses to be built on the outskirts of the urban centres.

The individual ideas and clauses of the Bill as such were not new. In the course of history they have been attempted in various forms in most countries but usually with small success. What was new was the organic interrelation between all measures, the work promotion schemes and the "back to the land" movement, thereby becoming practicable for the State. The economic assistance rendered by the Bill has been instrumental in more marriages being contracted and healthy children being born so that the objective has been substantially attained as the following statistics indicate:

Marriages contracted.	510,000	631,000	740,000	...
Live issue.	...	957,000	1,170,000	...
Subsidies granted.	...	*142,000	226,000	35,000
25% Remissions due to births.	...	...	130,000	39,000

* 3rd and 4th quarter.

† 1st quarter.

The number of marriages contracted has actually increased, likewise the number of living births, and quite obviously as a result of the Government measures. But since the middle of 1934 and most conspicuously at the beginning of 1935 the influence of the legal measures diminished in respect to growth in population. At the end of a period of unemployment and during an economic trough great results were possible, these measures alone enabling large numbers to marry and have children. In the long run, however, even greater than the economic aspect is the general economic resurrection of 1934/35 in conjunction with the influence on thought and the life attitude diffused by the National Socialist Government Party supporting the belief in family and children. This is in practical evidence in all social efforts.

The Bill should also prove of permanent value in regard to migration from the more congested areas to rural surroundings which appears to have resulted with such momentum from the same philosophy, the mental attitude toward life having created a greater love of the home and a greater longing for life on one's own plot of land. Probably Government measures in support of marriage will be more definitely directed toward establishing small holdings in future and in other ways assisting the re-peopling of country districts.

ALCOHOL AND ROAD ACCIDENTS.*

Mr. Hore-Belisha, Minister of Transport, asked the British Medical Association at the beginning of the year to give him its observations on the place of alcohol in the causes of road accidents. The Association appointed a special committee under Dr. W. G. Willoughby, and its report has just appeared. The committee concentrated on small or "sub-intoxicant" doses of alcohol, less than would be likely to bring a motorist into the dock and far less than would cause social drunkenness. It has perforce relied on indirect evidence; statistics of accidents in which the question has been raised of whether the driver was under the influence of drink, and experiments on the effect of alcohol upon the faculties—judgment, memory, reaction, and muscular co-ordination—which are the foundation of safe driving. It quotes the Alcohol Committee of the Medical Research Council for the statement that alcohol is a narcotic and impairs judgment, concentration, self-criticism, and the power of estimating risk. It therefore leads persons to take risks and make rapid decisions less judiciously than they otherwise would. Impairment of concentration and reasoning power has, the Committee point out, been established by physiological experiment. The driving of a motor car involves a succession of highly skilled muscular movements which depend on rapid and accurate co-ordination between the hands, eyes and feet. According to the M. R. C., the speed with which the gaze is directed to fresh objects is diminished by alcohol. Speed and accuracy of hand movement have been shown by typewriting tests to suffer, and the co-ordination required in rifle-shooting and mountaineering is impaired. Alcohol disappears slowly from the blood, and substantial amounts remain in the blood even several hours after a moderate quantity of drink has been taken. The committee conclude that three ounces of whisky will affect the driving capacity of many persons some hours afterwards, and will make them think they are driving better than usual while really they are less efficient. These findings are no surprise to persons with any training in physiology, but may be news to laymen and lawyers. Besides indicating a possibly fertile cause of accidents, they suggest that the present law is not being administered as the facts demand. Under the Road Traffic Act a motorist is culpable who is incapable through drink or drugs of having proper control of his vehicle. This provision will cover the motorist who is not nearly drunk in the social or police-court sense, but its application is a matter of opinion. The subject was threshed out fairly fully at the Medico-Legal Society last month when discussion indicated that before a motorist is likely to be convicted he must show some fairly obvious symptoms. Many physiological authorities regard him as a dangerous motorist even when he is apparently sober, simply because a minimal quantity of alcohol will impair his judgment of speed and distance, his visual acumen and his reaction-time, the factors which the National Institute of Industrial Psychology regard as essential in a driver's safety or danger. It is not likely that police surgeons and courts will give the Act the drastic interpretation which the facts suggest, because incapacity must be proved as a fact, and individuals differ so much in their initial skill and their reaction to alcohol. Better results should be obtained by energetic publication to motorists and pedestrians of the danger of little drinks.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Children of Mixed Marriages:—In the delightful "Story of my Life," Queen Marie of Roumania gives a sad picture of the distress caused to religious parents and their children by the disharmony resulting from a mixed marriage. Her father was a son of Queen Victoria and her mother a daughter of the Emperor Alexandra II of Russia. Queen Marie writes:

"My mother clung to her Church with all her soul, and no matter in what house she lived, a little Orthodox chapel was erected in some corner of it, and she always kept in her service a Russian priest and two chanters who followed her wherever she went. We children were brought up in the Anglican Church, and I believe it was a lifelong grief to my mother that we were Protestants.....Scrupulously respecting the faith we were christened in, she rather shunned speaking of religion with us; fearing perhaps to influence us in any way. But there was also, I think, a feeling that we might not understand the beauty of her cult that, we might not approach with sufficient reverence that which was so fundamentally part of her inner being. So a certain shyness always existed between us when discussing or referring to religious matters....Mother adored us, gave up her life to us but for all that she had little faith in us, that was the strange, strange thing. Above all, we were Protestants, and therefore some parts of our souls were shut off from hers." The Catholic Examiner makes the following characteristic comment on this passage:

"This frank autobiography makes one realize how little regard is paid to the religious convictions of the parties in many a royal marriage, and that often the Catholic wife in particular is more to be pited than blamed for actions which the Church is bound to condemn."

NOTES

Bombing from the Air:—The attempt to abolish bombing from the air by international agreement was frustrated by the British Government insisting on making an exception on the Indian Frontier. We do not wish to make much of this as even if an agreement had been come to, it is highly improbable that it would have been kept. Italy, for instance, would not have foregone her advantage in the possession of this means of mass murder in her effort to absorb Abyssinia. She would have urged the identical reasons which the Foreign Secretary to the Government of India urged in opposing Dr. Khan Sahib's motion for adjournment of the Legislative Assembly last week to call attention to the bombing of women and children in a trans-frontier village by the Royal Air Force. This operation, he said, "offset the advantage of inaccessibility, which the tribesmen always enjoyed. It also saved time and money, caused a smaller number of casualties both amongst our own troops and the enemy. The idea was to cause discomfort and economic pressure, and to induce the tribes to surrender without loss of life. Thus this was a most humane form of warfare." Whatever it may be, it is certainly not war as the word was understood by the author of "the Moral Equivalent of War." This is sheer man hunt in which there is very little of the qualities which invested the military career with a moral significance. It is not an economical method if we take into consideration the cost not only of particular operations but that also of permanently maintaining an Air Force in anticipation of them. It is not even effective on the Government's own showing. Bombing has been practised during the last ten years but raids by tribesmen took place in 1927, 1930, 1932, 1933, 1934 and 1935. When German Zeppelins dropped bombs on London during the late War, the operation was not applauded as a humane one. Dr. Khan Sahib knows what he is talking about. He is a Frontier man himself. He said that bombing took place near his village. He saw the R. A. F. planes going. The first notice to the villagers of this operation was the bombing itself. In any case, dropping notices was useless as the tribesmen were illiterate. The debate was raised to a broader plane by Mr. Bhulabhai Desai, Leader of the Opposition. He condemned the use of bombs from the air as a barbarous and inhuman practice. He declared that whenever Indians came into power, they would not use such an instrument. "We stand here to show," he concluded, "that we shall always stand for a civilised method of warfare and that even though we are less scientific and less mechanical, we at any rate, are more civilized." Mr. Tottenham interrupted. Bombs, he said, were not thrown on the civil population. Mr. Desai is an expert cross-examiner. "Then why did you give notice," he asked: "Whom did you give notice to?" There was no answer. The Leader of the Opposition went on to say that he did not wish to discuss whether one method was more economical than another, and hoped that the House would by its vote show that they condemned the bombing of civil population and women and children. The House carried the motion by 67 to 41 votes. Of the latter, 26 were the votes of officials.

Railway but no Engines:—The mere statement that the Government of India has all these years been constructing thousands of miles of railways but are still importing locomotives, is sufficient to arouse surprise in people who are not well posted in Indian fiscal methods. Mr. Sam Venkatachallam Chetty, the representative of South Indian Commerce in the Legislative Assembly, moved a resolution on Wednesday urging immediate steps to equip State Railway Workshops with machinery to manufacture all the engines needed in the country. One Indian member, Sir A. H. Ghaznavi, opposed the resolution on the ground that it was cheaper to buy the engines from outside than to make them here. Britain can buy engines more cheaply from Germany or Belgium but she prefers to make her own. Presumably Englishmen do so for good reasons. The fallacy of the Calcutta Muslim member's reasoning is that the cheapness of the imported article is heavily offset by the cost of maintaining Indian unemployed which, though it does not fall in this country on the State because the State does not recognise that it has a duty to relieve unemployment, has nevertheless to be borne by the community. It is surprising to see this fallacy persisting in the mind of so distinguished a political leader as Sir A. H. Ghaznavi. The Finance Member, Sir James Grigg, seems to be guided by a single idea in his Indian policies. Whatever the Indian advocates, he must oppose. Sir James has a blunt way of speaking and bluntness is often associated with sincerity. He is, we are sure, quite sincere in his belief that the best interests of India are served by antagonising Indian opinion and that the highest aim of fiscal policy is to raise loans at 3 per cent in the London Market. To attain this end no sacrifice can be too great, no suffering inflicted on the people too hard. His Free Trade fallacies would be laughed out in his own country. A Civil Servant trained to take orders from his parliamentary superiors in England, he finds himself in a position to dictate policies here and makes the most of the opportunity. We only wish that he will not be so dogmatic about his being the only person who knows what is to India's interests and what is not. The new Commerce Member, Sir Zaffarullah Khan, said that Government were waiting to see a final type of engine evolved before establishing a factory to make engines. Deisel engines are claimed to be more economical than steam engines but at some future date it may be found that there is a still more economical type. The Government want to spare India the cost of experiments. Let others do it for us and when the last discovery is made, we shall adopt it! Till then let us go on importing engines from abroad.

Communism Against Fascism:—The seventh Congress of the Comintern met in Moscow in the last week of July. Stalin attended the Congress and met with an enthusiastic reception as the Leader of the World Proletariat. This session of the Congress formulated as a policy certain tendencies which have been in operation for some time past towards compromise with Capitalism. Communists have discovered that Fascism is a greater enemy than Capitalism and that in order to fight Fascism they should avail themselves of such assistance as bourgeois democracy can give. "Where there is a Fascist dictatorship," argued the leader of the now almost extinct German Communists, "the proletariat is deprived even of the most insignificant rights and opportunity legally to defend its class interests. Therefore, we, Communists, will fight wholeheartedly to retain every ounce of democratic Freedom. We are ready to defend the remnants of parliamentarism and Democracy together with the real adherents of bourgeois Democracy against Fascism in order to fight for proletarian Democracy." Practical effect was given to this changed attitude by six German Communists in

New York harbour. They smuggled themselves into the German ship, Bremen, as it was about to sail, tore down the Nazi flag and flung it into the Hudson river. They were at once arrested by the American Police. The remarks of the Magistrate who tried them were cabled last week by Reuter. In acquitting them he said that the flying of the swastika flag in New York harbour might have been regarded by the defendants and other citizens as "gratuitously brazen flaunting of an emblem symbolising antagonism to American ideals and representing an atavistic throwback to pre-medieval, if not barbaric, conditions." He described the Bremen as "a pirate ship with the black flag of piracy proudly flying aloft." The Magistrate evidently did not regard the Communism of the defendants as antagonistic to American ideals. But the United States Government have recently warned the Soviet against indulging in Communist propaganda in America. In receiving the Italian Ambassador this week at Berlin, "Führer" Hitler significantly referred to the common ideals of Social Democracy and Fascism.

Is Japan Changing:—One of the countries mentioned in the Comintern meeting "as Fascist, against which the Party should co-operate with bourgeois Democracies in future wars," was Japan. Japan, however, has receded into the background since Signor Mussolini appeared on the scene as the redeemer of Ethiopia from the tyranny of the Negus. It would seem, now that Manchukuo is an accomplished fact and China has been converted to the policy of friendly relations with her powerful neighbour, Japan is turning aside from militarism. An American paper states that Japan's premier merchant princes, the House of Mitsui, received an order from the Italian Government for 100,000 pairs of soldiers' boots some time back. They refused to supply them. "The House of Mitsui," the Italian Government was informed, "refuses to help the strong to bully the weak." There is at present a religious revival in Japan which is also a factor in shaping her world outlook. Bombay, by the way, is likely to have a Japanese Buddhist monastery at Worli soon.

Is Sterilisation Birth Control?—We publish this week an interesting letter from Dr. Pillay, Editor-in-Chief, in explanation—and amplification—of his editorial comment in Marriage Hygiene on the proposed voluntary sterilisation of lepers at Jalgaon. Dr. Pillay insists that sterilisation is a method of birth control. Birth-controllists as a rule are careful to distinguish between the two because of the irrevocability of sterilisation. Dr. Pillay suggests that it is quite common nowadays for doctors to advise a father of four children or more to be sterilised if his earning capacity does not permit further additions to his family. This is frankly news to us. If it is true, doctors ought to be more careful in their own interests. Four children are not of the nature of permanent investments.

nor is the earning capacity of men fixed throughout their lives. Sterilisation affects neither the desire for children nor does it prevent a man who resorts to it, from earning more. We can picture a sterilised father who has lost the children he had at the time of the operation or is later able and anxious to support a larger family, entreating the enthusiastic but indiscreet doctor to de-sterilise him. It is one thing to recommend birth control to heads of large families and quite another to suggest sterilisation. Dr. Pillay discloses a startling medical practice when he remarks that "it is usual now to advise sterilisation for all fathers... if their wives' health does not permit the luxury of a larger family." The learned Doctor does not reveal how the wife will be saved from the danger of further child-bearing by sterilising the husband. Much as we might desire it, nature has not enforced monogamy on human beings and Dr. Pillay has published sufficient articles on the breakdown of monogamous marriage to realise that, even among women who have been warned of the danger to their lives of bearing another child, there are likely to be transgressors against the conventional ideas of marriage. There is, from another point of view, the possibility of the sterilised husband surviving his wife and desiring to marry again. Dr. Pillay has probably sought to inflict this enforced widowhood on Indian husbands as compensation for the hardships suffered by widows in Hindu society. Dr. Pillay's original paragraph sounded sinister. His letter explaining it, is foolish.

The League of Nations and the Italo-Abyssinian Dispute:—The League of Nations Council Meeting on the 4th provided exciting scenes. The Italian delegate read out a long indictment of Abyssinian misrule. The Council adjourned. When it met again, the French delegate of Abyssinia, Dr. Jeze made a fiery speech, which is said to have gone beyond diplomatic conventions, against Italy. Unable to bear the reproaches, Baron Aloisi, the Italian representative, left the meeting and was followed by his colleague, Signor Rocca. They let it be known that they did not regard Abyssinia as an equal and would not sit in the Council whenever the Abyssinian delegate was on his legs. The peppery Frenchman was thereupon replaced by a sedate Ethiopian. The Council appointed a Committee of five to adjudicate between the disputants. Italy at first refused to have English and Frenchmen on the Committee as they were interested parties. Later the objection was withdrawn. It is forecast that the Committee would recommend that Abyssinia should accept Italy in the same role as that of Britain in Iraq. The Emperor Haile Sallassie has anticipated this by declaring that he would not accept a Protectorate or surrender the control of his police and army to foreign hands. Indeed, a suggestion of this kind would bring the League into greater disrepute than if it frankly avowed that it could not settle the differences between the two countries. War preparations are meanwhile progressing. Italy has despatched 70 submarines on secret manoeuvres towards the African coast. Twenty-four British warships are lying in the harbour at Alexandria. The reception of the Italian Ambassador at Berlin three weeks earlier than the day fixed, is regarded in diplomatic circles as a serious portent. This may be due to Mr. Litvinov's plain speaking at the League Council. While the Italian statement showed there was misrule in Abyssinia, he said, that did not justify Italy's interference in violation of Abyssinian sovereignty. A request by America to have an observer with the Italian Army in the event of war, has remained without answer.

Sir Samuel Hoare's Speech:—Sir Samuel Hoare's speech at the League of Nations on Wednesday judging from the cabled summary is one of great interest. It enunciated a political principle of far-reaching importance. Sir Samuel's speech laid down a new principle in the relation of Western nations to other nations which are backward in their capacity for development of their material resources. That principle, in brief, is that these nations should be helped by the more advanced without infringing on their independence and national integrity. That Great Britain herself had not followed this principle in the past, should not come in the way of our appreciation of its immense importance for the future. Speaking before the nations of the world, on behalf of his Government, Sir Samuel Hoare has pledged his country to be henceforth guided by this principle. He has called the world to judge of Britain's future policy by this principle. Apart from its effect on the Italo-Abyssinian dispute the speech is, therefore, of world importance. Incidentally, it has brought the British and Indian mind in sympathetic contact which must lead to a better understanding of each other.

Ireland and the British Commonwealth:—Lord Birkenhead prints in his Life of his father, a remarkable memorandum on the future relations between Ireland and Great Britain by Michael Collins on the eve of the establishing of the Free State. He remarks that it foreshadowed the Statute of Westminster. We reprint it in this issue. There are some passages which show the close analogy between the Irish and the Indian problems. The passage in which Collins emphasises the difference between the other Dominions and Ireland, is especially interesting. It is claimed for the new Government of India Act that, if properly worked, it will lead to the position envisaged in the Westminster Statute for Dominions. But the recognition of India as a separate and constitutionally independent nation need not wait until that time. Such recognition will at once change the attitude of Indians to the Act and pre-dispose them to work it in a spirit of co-operation. realpatidar.com

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

BOMBAY, September 14, 1935.

INDIAN CHRISTIANS AND THEIR OPPORTUNITY.

The Rev. J. F. Edwards of the American Marathi Mission, English Editor of the Dnyanodaya, made an important speech at a public meeting of the Bombay Representative Christian Council last week on "The Present Christian Opportunity in India." Mr. Edwards makes it clear, however, that the opportunity calls in the first place for self-examination. "Turn your eyes inward" is the key-note of this powerful address. During the last twenty-five years the Indian Christian population has increased from three and a half to six and a quarter millions. This increase has brought with it increased liabilities. While illiteracy in the total population has decreased by one per cent in the last quarter of a century it has increased by six per cent among the Christian section. This is the direct result of mass movements. "If as we pray," says the C. L. S. Indian Bookman, "the mass movements still increase, illiteracy will mount shockingly, unless we can do something more effective than we are now doing." The burden of coping with this increasing liability has been transferred to Indians during these twenty-five years. Mr. Edwards evidently regards this "Indianising of our entire Christian organization, of giving primacy of place and honour to India's own sons and daughters and of shifting the responsibility more and more to the Indian Church" as the most notable achievement of the period. He even thinks that the British Government has been encouraged by the example of Indianisation set by the Missions to pass the new Government of India Act. While responsibility has increased and with it opportunity, capacity to meet them has not increased. Mr. Edwards reminds the Indian Christian community that it has not been able as yet to get rid of the caste complex. "You and I know only too well," he says, "that caste spirit is by no means limited to the State of Travancore and that some of our gravest Christian problems in Western India arise from the spirit of caste in the Christian community, a spirit which is the very negation of Christian brotherhood. I suggest to you that this unchristian-like attitude will only be corrected as we receive more and more of the infilling of the Holy Spirit and as we faithfully place under rigorous Christian discipline all those Church members who in this or other ways bring the name of Jesus into disrepute." What he says of the spirit of caste equally applies to the spirit of race and nationality. Europe today presents the spectacle of a Christianity-disciplined population which has not been swayed by the spirit of caste, torn by bitter animosities under the sway of economic nationalism. Christian Missions in India have the ground cut from under their feet by the complete abandonment of Christian principles by Christian nations in their international conduct.

Mr. Edwards does not ignore this aspect of his subject. He says: "When those Indian editors, whom we call non-Christian, point out the inconsistencies of us Christian people, they are not only perfectly justified in doing so, because our standards are professedly higher than anyone else's, but they also perform for us a real service in reminding us of the one and only ideal of Jesus by which we must measure ourselves." This is one way of looking at the subject. The other and simpler way is that non-Christians do not believe in the efficacy of proselytising as a means of raising the moral and spiritual tone of men and nations. What Mr. Edwards takes to be the amazing confidence of the Indian people in the Christian community, Missionaries and Indian Christians alike, is from this point of view merely a recognition of the utter futility of mass conversions to improve the moral or even the material condition of the converts. The progressive Christian journal, the Guardian, touches lightly on this feature of the Missions problem in last week's issue. "It can no longer be said," it says, "that conversion to Christianity is a sure way of getting jobs. The position has been completely reversed so far as the prospects of influencing the Government through this means is concerned. The rule of employment on population ratio has begun to affect Indian Christians adversely. The reverse tendency among depressed classes is even more marked for special facilities and privileges are reserved only for 'Hindus' among them. The matter is so serious to the poor that Depressed Classes Christians have even reverted to their original faith rather than lose the advantages they badly need." The implied admission that conversions from among the depressed classes in the past have been related to the facility thereby enjoyed for material gains is worth noting. The exposure of the method recently followed in a South Indian village, has opened many eyes hitherto closed to obvious facts. We reprint today a letter in the Hindu by a Hindu landholder, Mr. Ramanuja Charya, showing how extraneous reasons induce the depressed classes to change their religion. Among the higher castes, conversion is now a recognised means of evading the Hindu marriage law which interdicts divorce.

We can wish for nothing better from the national, as well as the religious, point of view than the existence amongst us of Christian men and women who illustrate in themselves the noble teachings of Jesus whom they worship as God and whom the whole world reveres as an inspired Teacher. Mr. Edwards' exhortation to the Christian community to live the Christ life, will find a hearty response from all religious-minded people. "Let us," he pleads, "aim at true Christian quality in all our work, rather than at numbers, for the surest and most effective tive way of leading India to Jesus Christ will be to present to India the living spectacle of a Christlike Church, a Christlike Society." India does not need any interpreter to her of Jesus. "One of the most amazing things in the present Indian religious situation," as Mr. Edwards himself says, "is the astonishing way in which Jesus Christ is triumphing in so many parts of India over the influence of our imperfect lives and over the defects of our presentation of his message." There is no question of triumphing here. There have been among Missionaries men who, by their devotion to high ideals, by their self-sacrifice and by their love of humanity, have endeared themselves to thousands who came under their influence. These men were not out to make converts. Some of them, indeed, refused to convert persons who sought conversion attracted by their personality. Mr. Edwards' address marks him out as one whose sympathies are with this type of the great Missionaries whom India has known and honours. Proselytism stands in the way of Christians sharing fully in the service of their country. Drop it, and they will find their opportunity to influence Indian life and thought increase a thousandfold. It stunts their own spiritual growth. Those who are pre-occupied with the thought of saving other men's souls, are apt to forget that they have souls of their own to be saved.

THE GOUR ACT AND HINDU FAMILY RIGHTS.

Dr. Gour has spoken of his Act as intended to "enlarge the rights of persons" by the double process of "giving them the advantage of the English law of succession" embodied in the Indian Succession Act, and "removing the incubus of joint-family obligations." Who are the persons benefited by this dual process? No doubt, the one who marries under the Act and his new wife and their daughters. But at whose expense are they so benefited? Not certainly at the expense and to the detriment of the kinsmen from whom the man becomes legally separated by reasons of his Gourian marriage, but entirely at the expense of the male issue of such marriage!

The Indian Succession Act is made applicable only to the property left by a Gourian Hindu at his death (vide Section 24). It determines who should inherit the property after him and in what shares they should each take it. So far as his own rights are concerned in relation to his ancestral family he gets nothing more from its joint assets than the share of which he would be entitled under the ordinary Hindu law if partition were made at the date of registering his marriage. And that share would be subject to the usual obligation of providing for the maintenance of certain female dependents and discharging his fair share of family debts, if any, outstanding at that date. The Gour Act does not set him free from this obligation. And there are no other obligations which even a non-Gourian Hindu is legally bound to bear when he secedes from his joint family, whatever services he may willingly render to them and whatever sacrifices he may gladly make for them till his death, out of affection and the goodness of his heart.

But the Gourian Hindu, like the orthodox Dayabhaga Hindu of Bengal, takes his share of ancestral property with absolute rights of disposal over it till his death, unlike the Mitakshara Hindu of Bombay, Madras, Benares, Mithila, etc., whose rights are absolute only till he begets a son. The rights of a Mitakshara Hindu may be said to be thus enlarged by marrying under the Act. His sons by the Gour marriage cannot claim to form a joint family with him or with one another, cannot claim as of right any fraction from the share of property which he got from his father and brothers, and cannot prevent him from selling or giving it away to strangers, if he so pleases, either by gift during life or by a will which takes effect after his death. They can only inherit to him after he is gone, if he has left them anything to inherit. But even then they cannot take the whole of what is left and divide it among themselves, like the Hindu sons of a Mitakshara or Dayabhaga family. Their mother, who is a mere maintenance-holder under the ordinary Hindu law, takes a one-third share absolutely under the Indian Succession Act, as the widow of the deceased owner; and each of their sisters, if any, who ordinarily have no rights at all when their deceased father has left sons, and a widow take under the same Act an equal share with each of the brothers in the remaining two-thirds with absolute rights of disposal. Thus the rights of the widow and the daughters, too, are enlarged at the cost of the sons. But no grievance, surely, can be made of this dispensation on the sons' behalf, since it is part of the Act which is the foundation of their being. If the owner himself disliked this statutory legal arrangement, it is always open to him to execute a will prescribing how and by whom his property is to be enjoyed after him, and his wishes will prevail over the statute.

Intercaste and intercommunal marriages are in the nature of things bound to be rare. It is for ordinary caste marriages that Dr. Gour's Act should become a favourite with marriageable girls and their parents on the one hand, and with chivalrous young men on the other who honour the principle of monogamy and are willing to openly give a higher married status to their wives than is inherent in the unregistered Hindu marriage and who are also in favour of securing to the wife and daughter larger inheritance rights than they can have under the Hindu law of intestate succession. They should find it easy to get over the prejudice created in their minds by the scare-crow provision which seems to debar the persons coming under the Act from the right of religious offices and the management of charitable trusts. It is not every young man that has such offices and trusts coming in his way. And if nothing in Section 23 shall confer such a right, neither shall it take away nor debar any such right acquired otherwise.

As for the sections which affect to deprive a Gourian Hindu of the right of adoption and to give to his orthodox father the right to ignore his existence and adopt a stranger as his son, they are mere pompous futilities, gratuitous annoyances, uncalled-for superfluities and ridiculous anomalies, but nothing worse. A Hindu adoption serves a religious purpose coveted by the adopting parents and a secular purpose beneficial to the adopted son. No human law can obstruct the spiritual benefits which according to Hindu belief flow from the religious rite of adoption. Section 25 of the Gour Act does not prevent any man from going through that ritual. It only prevents the son so adopted from claiming the property rights which an adopted son acquires automatically under the Hindu law. The adopting father himself can easily rectify this defect by making a settlement or gift or a bequest.

to the boy he adopts without allowing the words of the section to frighten him from performing the sacred ceremony which his heir craves for.

The next provision, which gives the right of adoption to the Hindu father whose only son marries under the Act, may at least be pardoned for its generous feeling though it cannot be commended for its consistency. The same father would have no right to make an adoption if his only son defied him and outraged his feelings by doing everything that Hindu religion, orthodox sentiment, filial duty and human decency prohibit by refusing to do everything that they enjoin or by becoming a proselyte to an alien religion. On the other hand, even though the son be a good Hindu and an honourable man and the bride he chooses is eligible by every canon of orthodoxy and is approved by the father himself, and the customary sacred ritual is not dispensed with in the smallest particulars, but the marriage is registered under the Gaur Act one moment before the orthodox marriage rites are gone through, the father becomes free to ignore his existence and adopt another as his son. But why should this anomalous legal incident frighten any young man from marrying under the Act? It is nothing worse than the birth of a younger brother, which he has no right to prevent in the natural course. A divided father is under the Hindu law free in any case to beget sons or give away his entire property to a stranger if he likes by will without leaving anything for his divided son to inherit. Even without this section in the Gaur Act he could have made such a gift or bequest stipulating that the boy so benefitted shall assume his surname and gotra and perform his obsequies. If there is a spiritual law which prohibits an adoption as improper and inefficacious when made while a natural born son is living, the permission granted by the Gaur Act cannot possibly render such adoption spiritually right and beneficial by any means. No one need grudge the angry or disappointed father his poor satisfaction that the Gaur Act has granted him a boon.

K. R.

THE WOMAN WORKER AND GENEVA.

The International Labour Organisation is still exercising its great power to restrict the rights of the woman worker. The number of ratifications, for example, of the 1919 Night Work Convention have increased from 19 to 30; of the Childbirth Convention 1919 from 11 to 16; and of the White Lead (Painting) Convention 1921 from 17 to 23. The Night Work Convention is being applied to primitive communities where industry hardly exists and in tropical countries where work during the heat of the day is more arduous than work at night. Two new prohibitory Conventions have been adopted—in 1934 the revised night work convention which applies to all women except the small category of responsible managers not doing manual work, and in 1935 the Convention which prohibits the work of all women underground in mines with possible exceptions in the case of certain non-manual workers. The adoption of this revised convention does not release one single woman from the prohibition as some suppose. That is a matter entirely within the power of each separate State. It is good to know that in the Commission of the Conference which dealt with the Mines Convention, one voice, that of Miss Gloerfelt Tarp of Denmark, speaking for herself and not for her Government, was raised in protest against its adoption.

A custom dangerous for all but specially dangerous where proposals for the differential treatment of women are under discussion is growing up in the conduct of the business of the International Labour Conference. Insufficient publicity is given to the text of revised and new Conventions coming up for consideration. In 1933 the printed Agenda item on the revised Night Work Convention, and in 1934 the printed Agenda item on the women in mines Convention, in each case gave the text of the other articles in the Convention but omitted the text of the formal articles dealing with denunciation. This means that members of the public like ourselves who buy those printed agenda items for our information, are in the dark as to the full effect of the proposals to come before the International Labour Conference which so seriously affect women. Moreover, the various rules and standing orders which require the clear definition and adequate notice of proposals for the revision of the Night Work Convention were not adhered to. There was no text to show beforehand that ten years was to be the length of the successive periods during which there could be no denunciation.

It will be of interest to see the information the International Labour Office announces it is shortly to publish with the help of members of the Correspondence Committee on Women's Work on the substitution of female for male labour and vice versa and its effect on wages. But it tends to undermine public confidence that the names of the particular members of that Committee selected to be asked to supply the information should not have been made public and that they were not given to a member of the Committee who asked for them. On such a subject surely all the members of the Committee should have been asked for information.

But it is not all gloom where the International Labour Organisation is concerned. We welcome the frank admission in the Director's last Report that "the whole subject of women's work merits closer and more unprejudiced analysis than it has yet received." We welcome the decision of the governing body to reconstitute its Industrial Hygiene Committee, and its public acknowledgment that the Committee lays too much stress on the medical aspect of the worker. That Committee proposed to draw up a list of occupations to be prohibited to women of childbearing age. Under its auspices the International Labour Office brought out the egregious brochure on women's work, in which the woman worker was treated as a pathological specimen. Our protests at Stockholm and Prague have not been in vain. In the International Labour Review two further articles deal seriously and objectively with the woman worker as a person with interests of her own and an end in herself: one by Mr. Henri Fuss, a chief of section of the International Labour Office, and the other by Dr. Grunfeld. We agree with much in the article of Mr. Fuss. But he has not yet disabused his mind of the false doctrine that "women's constitution has certain peculiarities as compared with men's" which justify the special restriction of their rights as workers. He accepts without criticism this traditional dogma inherited by the International Labour Organisation from its parent the International Association for Labour Legislation—a tradition dating from a time when women were assumed to be essentially and permanently a subordinate class. He even asserts—quite wrongly—that this doctrine is part of the programme assigned to the International Labour Organisation. His opinion appears to rest on confusion of thought due to the question-begging use of the word "protection" to describe the special restriction of women's work in their supposed interest. The unprejudiced analysis foreshadowed in the Director's Report involves the scrapping of this question-begging use of the word "protection" and the idea which underlies it, and the examination of the question whether special restriction on the work of women can in fact protect them.

Our task is not growing more easy. We have to go on pointing out to governments, trade unions, women's organisations and the general public the need to examine without prejudice the International Labour Organisation's dangerous policy in regard to women. We have to go on seeking to change the attitude of mind which makes governments apply that policy without criticism as emanating from an infallible source.

And our task is becoming more complicated. At the time of our formation in 1929 we were concerned to keep off the statute book laws which placed clearly defined restrictions on the woman worker supposed by many supporters of those restrictions to be in her interest. That work has to go on. We have now to be on the watch for new attacks on the woman worker. We have to be on the watch for proposals to benefit male workers at the expense of women workers by prohibiting or curtailing women's work; for proposals to give arbitrary power to a minister to say what work a woman may or may not do, or what quotas of women workers are to be allowed, or to say what work is dangerous to a woman's health or morals and to be prohibited to her. We have to be on the watch lest powers be delegated to employers and workers to make agreements to limit the work of women; or to Trade Boards to fix rates of wages lower for women than for men; or to committees to limit the insurance rights of the women worker. We have to be on the watch lest the expenditure of public fund provide technical training and employment for men only. We have to be on the watch lest discriminations against the women worker are written into new constitutions or included in agreements between sovereign states or other groups of states. We have to be on the watch lest international conventions restricting women's work tie up their victims so tightly that escape becomes next to impossible.

CHRYSTAL MACMILLAN.

STERILISATION AND BIRTH CONTROL

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer

Sir,

The remarks in your esteemed Journal of 7th September under the heading "Why Sterilise?" are based on a misconception of the meaning and implications of the following words that appeared in the Editorial of Marriage Hygiene, August 1935: "Why not try sterilisation as a birth control measure, the safest and the best method for the poor?" This is merely a statement of facts. Sterilisation is the safest contraceptive measure now known, whether for the poor or for the rich. The other known contraceptives, to be effective, need intelligent application and this the poor are not likely to do. Then again if doctors like the Jalgaon Civil Surgeon are prepared to do the operation free, it entails no recurring charges for the purchase of contraceptives. Therefore it is the best birth control measure for the poor.

It was not suggested that the poor should be sterilised because they are poor or even before they have children. It is the usual practice now to advise sterilisation for all fathers who have four children or more if their earning capacity and their wives' health do not allow them the luxury of a larger family. The fact that the poor will not voluntarily resort to sterilisation or that the operation is irrevocable does in no way affect the contention that it is the safest and the best method of birth control, under the conditions mentioned above.

AN ANTI-CHILD MARRIAGE COMMITTEE.

The Editor,
The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

The All India Women's Conference has constituted an Anti-Child Marriage Committee with the following objects in view:—

1. To carry on an intensive nation-wide propaganda against child marriage,
2. To institute prosecutions under the Child Marriage Restraint Act, and
3. To agitate for improvements in the above Act.

On behalf of the Conference and the Committee, I invite such of your readers as are interested in the above-mentioned purposes to correspond with me giving us any suggestions they may have to offer in the matter.

We shall also be glad to receive (1) information regarding existing Anti-Child Marriage Committees and (2) names of persons who are prepared in their areas to organise new Committees for the same purpose.

I need hardly add that, considering the shameful magnitude of this preventable evil, only an organised and nation-wide attack on it will be adequate.

MR. SASTRI AND THE SARDA ACT.

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

With reference to your note on my letter on "Mr. Sastri and the Sarda Act," published in the Reformer of 31st August, let me state that, so far as my knowledge goes, the views expressed by him at Annamalainagar in July 1935 were given expression to by him in his speech at Trichinopoly in April 1934, the full text of which appeared in The Indian Express of 8th April 1934, and in that at Bangalore, the text of which appeared in the Hindu of 27th August, 1934. In his Bangalore speech, he said, "The Bill in its original form was a totally different piece of legislation. In two or three steps, it underwent drastic modifications. Somehow or other, the country was either apathetic or looked on while the apparently wise men were doing what they thought was for the good of the country. Again, the reformer's voice was not unanimous. I was one of those who felt that the measure in its final form was too drastic, exceeded the limits of proper law-making. I advised those that I had the fortune to talk to about the matter that the age might be reduced by two years or at least by one year." The views expressed in the three speeches are more or less the same, though couched in different language suited to each occasion. Mr. Sastri's criticism of the Sarda Act or venture in the field of social reform is not, therefore, recent.

THE GERMAN CHURCH CONFLICT.

(CONTRIBUTED.)

In his May speech to the Reichstag the German Leader and Chancellor declared once again most emphatically for the benefit of his own people and world opinion that National Socialism, as opposed to Bolshevism, never desired to abolish religion and turn its churches into clubs and theatres. This was an unmistakable reference to the German Church conflict which Hitler said was a matter of technical administration within the Protestant Church. Whereas the Bolsheviks preach and practice Atheism, Christian ethics are in no way endangered in the German Church dispute, the New State being neither hostile to the Church nor wishing to ignore it.

The causes of the dispute are in fact either divergencies of opinion among the various branches within the Church itself, or, as far as the relationship between the Church and State is concerned, it is a question of purely technical administrative matters. The Reich Minister of Education Rust expressed the same attitude in a recent political speech at Brunswick when he repeated that it was one of the first duties of the National Socialist State to protect the Christian confessions. The task which National Socialism had undertaken was of a political and not a religious nature and the settlement of the Church dispute must, therefore, be left in the hands of good Christians, for the matter could never be solved by an act of parliament. We are informed that this attitude was approved in Church circles although no way out of the deadlock is at present obvious. On the contrary the situation is more confused and obscure than ever before. The number of groups at war with one another has increased, so that if there is any menace to the Protestant Church life in Germany it lies within the Church itself which cannot come to peace. Although the Protestant conflict has done nothing to endanger the Church up to now but has even given it a new religious impulse, a positive settlement must be found before long. If it is allowed to continue indefinitely there is risk of a collapse from within, for the principles of Protestantism are not being made clearer and continual theological wrangling does not please ordinary Church-goers.

Reichsbishop Mueller is still unable to cope with the situation. At present he is trying to make himself known personally to congregations by preaching in churches all over the country. Once again at the beginning of the month a serious attempt at a settlement came to grief over the Reichsbishop himself to whom one side adheres with tenacity while the other refuses to accept him. Reichsbishop Mueller himself, to judge by an interview he gave to a Danish journalist, now also considers that a settlement will only be forthcoming from the ranks of the Church itself. The prospects at present seem most unpromising. The conflicting groups show signs of dissension among themselves. A few weeks ago differences of opinion arose among the German Christians. Their Reich Leader Dr. Kinder excluded his predecessor, the former Bishop Hossenfelder, from the movement on account of his sympathy with the tendencies of the national Church body.

The Opposition Church also has its own troubles. The national Synod was to meet at Augsburg but the meeting did not take place because the Lutheran Confessional Churches of Bavaria, Wurttemberg and Hanover suddenly decided they had no confidence in the presiding Reich Brotherhood Council. The three bishops Meiser, Wurm and Marahrens complained particularly that the Council in its present form shows too little understanding for the special attitude of the Lutheran Church. This criticism is apparently chiefly directed against the President of the Council

Koch of Oeynhausen. It is thought, however, that it is not so much theological differences but conflicting opinions as to the method of conducting the Church campaign which are responsible for the tension. Whether this will lead to an open breach remains to be seen. In any case this group no longer presents an impression of outward and inward unity.

This is a most undesirable state of affairs for German Protestantism as a whole and there seems little likelihood of a change. The only consolation is that all these groups with their private quarrels are unanimous in one thing—their readiness to defend Christianity itself at all costs against the attacks of the new Neo-Paganism. Church people are also satisfied that actual parish life is hardly and in no way directly affected by these theological disputes. It is possible that one day perhaps a new united Protestant Church may be built up from the parishes themselves where little patience is shown for theological quarrels between, and of late even among, the various Church sects.

During his stay in Germany the Canadian author and ex-serviceman, Mr. Erland Echlin who fought for Canada against Germany in the War, was received by the Reich Minister for the Interior Dr. Frick and had a long conversation with him on matters concerning German domestic policy.

Mr. Echlin was given detailed information on the attitude of the State towards the Church. Dr. Frick seemed optimistic on this point and said there was a great deal of misunderstanding abroad as to the real reasons for the Church conflict. The Reich Government, he said, did not want to place the Protestant Church in a worse position than the Catholic Church after the Concordat. It was, however, essential that the petty divisions into 28 Province Churches should be abolished in order that a United Protestant Church could be built. The Protestant Churchmen had accepted the proposals of the Government and had created a united Protestant Church without coercion or pressure. Differences of opinion then arose mostly from personal reasons and these were consequently misused for political reasons and given undue significance especially abroad. The Reich Government desires most sincerely a friendly settlement of the Church dispute, but it was inevitable that certain differences of opinion should exist through the very freedom of thought which this Church exercised.

Dr. Frick expressed pleasure that the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishop of Chichester had shown so much understanding of Germany in their last letters. The Reich Government would do all in its power to justify this understanding.

Speaking of relations with the Catholic Church Dr. Frick said emphatically that no one in Germany has been persecuted or molested on account of his Catholic belief. It was, however, unfortunately a fact that the Catholic Centrum Party had tried to gain political influence over Catholic associations and other organizations even after all parties had been prohibited in the National Socialist State. We have done with the political party system for ever, he said, and cannot allow it to begin its activities again in secret.

This accounts for the Government's attitude towards the Catholic Youth organizations. As long as they are confined to a purely religious training the State has no objection to them. It cannot, however, permit the younger generation to be utilized for political purposes directed against the National Socialist ideas of State and Law under the disguise of a religious movement.

Mr. Echlin said that it was often thought abroad that Alfred Rosenberg and other leading members of the Party-State were supporting a movement which was directed against the Christian Church.

"You mean the German Christian Movement?" asked Dr. Frick. "Quite recently at a National Socialist Gau meeting in Thuringia I declared publicly that we uphold Frederick the Great's principle according to which in our State everyone can pursue their own ideas of bliss. The German Christian Movement cannot be compared with Atheism. It is merely an endeavour to transmute the German belief in God in a manner corresponding to the nature of our people."

These official statements bear close resemblance to Adolf Hitler's words in his May speech when he said: "We are happy to belong to a European cultural community which has left the mark of its spirit to such a great degree on the world of today. The Bolsheviks denounce this cultural achievement of humanity saying that all real culture and the history of mankind was born of Marxism. We National Socialists may differ in opinions with our Protestant Church on this or that question of organization. We do not, however, want to abolish religion and belief, nor do we want to turn our Churches into clubs and cinemas."

A DAY WITH C. F. ANDREWS

Mr. E. Sambayya writes in The Guardian, Madras:—

It was on a sultry afternoon that I was taken to the beautiful airy room in the "Uttarayan" at Santiniketan and introduced to Mr. C. F. Andrews by his Secretary. He was finishing his letters to catch the afternoon's post. Though he was really racing with time he never gave the impression that he was busy. "You may be interested to look into some of these letters," he said to me after a brief conversation, and passed on to me several most interesting letters that had come the previous day. Now a short and yet very affectionate note from Mahatmaji, now a fiery letter from Agatha Harrison, a long and involved letter from a key man at Whitehall in connection with the communal award and so on, it was a pageant of interesting persons and events.

"Do you manage to answer all your letters, Mr. Andrews?"

"That's the difficulty. I try to answer every important letter. It is a world friendship, you know! In one way I am thankful."

The post having gone off we settled down to a long chat. C. F. A. regretted that he could not attend our Bengal S. C. M. Camp as he was expecting to sail for England just about that time. He said that his presence in England for the next few months was absolutely necessary in order to follow the publication of his new book: India and Britain: a Moral Challenge, with conferences and lectures. I gathered that he would be staying this time at his old college, Pembroke College, in Cambridge, and be planning for another book on Christ and Prayer.

During our conversation on evangelism, C.F.A. was quite amused when he learnt that, according to some Christians, he was aiming at world popularity by compromising and watering down the Christian message. Then in a most casual way he entered into a great discourse on tolerance and intolerance in religion and referred frequently to the cross in his life. He said that as his master, had Jesus, found great faith among certain non-Israelites such as the Syro-Phoenician woman and the Centurion, he had felt the presence of God in the company of some of his non-Christian friends, and in some homes which have had no Christian influence at all. Then he went on to say that his name was "mud" among his own countrymen for his continued protest against the imperialism of the White race. I was reminded of the incident of the rejection of Jesus by the Jews as C. F. A. told me of the indignities he suffered and the humiliations he was put to by his own countrymen because he could not tolerate the wrongs done to the Indians. "To have tolerance is perfectly easy, but the Christ in me would not let me tolerate; and hence the Cross." He said that his critics do not read the Gospels aright.

At my request C. F. A. dictated to me an article for Student Outlook on "East and West in Evangelism." He draws a fine distinction between the Johannine and the Pauline method in evangelism and shows that it would be most natural for the Indian Church to follow the Johannine method.

Mr. Andrews asked me a number of questions with regard to the Church in India. He wished to know if the modern missionary has any hearing of the Indian students at all. He showed keen interest in understanding the student problems in India and said that he would plan to spend a whole winter going round in colleges in India. Mr. C. F. A. was greatly distressed about the communal award. He thought that it was a fatal blow to the Church in India and to its future mission. Then he referred to the passages in his new book bearing on this subject and that of the safeguards in the India Bill. This idea of the futility of governing India with distrust at the back of the mind is very well worked out in one of the chapters of his new book.

It was dark by then, and he took me out for a short walk on the famous Red Road leading to the Surul farm.

C. F. A. was reading his letters when I went to him the following morning. Every now and then telegrams kept coming; and he would exclaim "that's excellent" after reading each one of them.

The manuscript of the new book was ready to be sent to England. He very kindly asked me to read a few chapters from that book. Parts of the book are in the form of Platonic dialogues. He asked me which of his books was widely read and appreciated in India. In that connection he said that he attached great significance to his book Christ in the Silence which, he said, he wrote by the side of a dying saint. "It ought to be a bedside book, and should be read frequently." C. F. A. keeps his pen very busy. In addition to the many letters he writes, he is engaged in some sort of literary work. He told me that he was revising the latest Hibbert lecture of Dr. Albert Schweitzer. He is expecting to bring out in the form of a booklet his experience of Christ.

After our return from the Sriniketan we started to talk about the Christian work in India. While speaking of one or two Christian friends who happen to be living in places where there was no opportunity for any kind of Christian fellowship, he said that it was a great spiritual strain to miss Christian fellowship, and that he himself had felt so whenever he was away from his Christian friends for long periods.

C. F. A. could not bear the thought of foreign leadership in the Indian church and in the Indian institutions. "It is no use missionaries being at the head of the Ashrams and institutions; and you people do not help us much. It is much better that you do a thing fifty times badly than our doing it well. It was for this reason that I could not accept the Principalship of the Delhi College."

After lunch he introduced me to the poet, who with his flowing robes and silvery hair looked like a dignified monarch. The poet has abandoned the "Uttarayan" and is now living in a wonderful mud-house designed by the Santiniketan architect. C. F. A. has uncommon veneration for the Poet, and as a token of love and gratitude, I expect, has dedicated his new book to the "Gurudev."

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Sept. 14]

In the afternoon I took leave of C. F. A., and we bade goodbye to each other in true oriental fashion. The short period spent with him lifted me out of myself and made me realize the futility of a self-centred life. The words of Jesus who said "He who loses his life shall find it" acquired a new significance for me after meeting Mr. Andrews. Having no home and no property he looked very rich. Any one who watches him from close quarters cannot fail to get the impression that he is a saint and a scholar.

SIDELIGHTS ON MASS CONVERSIONS.

Mr. C. Ramanujachari writes in The Hindu of Madras:—

Admittedly mass conversions are frequently taking place in this presidency; and in respect of several of them people will probably be able to trace at the bottom material inducement of some sort or other. A case of an infructuous attempt at such conversion happened to my personal knowledge a few years ago in my village—(Kolattur (No. 28)—Tirupporur Revenue firkā—Chingleput taluk). During one of my rare visits to the place, I noticed a stir in the cheri attached to the village—a pandal erected and a gathering collected. My enquiry of the village people only elicited the indifferent reply that some Christian who had been busying himself with the cheri people had probably come that day also. The next day the chief people of the cheri went in a body to Tirukkalikunram, where the Sub-Collector had been holding his jamabundy. Not being able to get any correct information locally, I also went to Tirukkalikunram, where I met the Adi-Dravidas and learnt from them that they had gone there to present a petition to the Sub-Collector in respect of the assignment to them of Government land for cultivation purposes. A perusal of the petition they had prepared showed that it was ill-drafted and badly jumbled up in regard to the subject matter also. They told me that the drafting was done by a Christian gentleman—apparently a catechist. Questioned about the nature of the interest which the gentleman had in the matter, they told me, though with some hesitation, that they of the whole cheri had agreed to become converts to Christianity in consideration of this service. They confessed to me that they knew nothing of that religion. When I asked them whether it was right for them to change their faith solely for this small help of drafting their petition, they quoted to me the instance of the neighbouring village of Ammanambakkam where the whole cheri became converts to Christianity for the help which a missionary gentleman gave them in respect of a dispute which they had with the then proprietor of the village—a Mahomedan. I assured the cheri people of my village that they could always look up to me for help of that kind and advised them that they need not on that account change their religion. They readily accepted the advice and gave up the idea of conversion. I on my part in consultation with the revenue officials drafted two fresh petitions, led their deputation to the Sub-Collector, thereafter moved the Labour Commissioner through further petitions and interviewed the officials on their behalf. Eventually they got what they wanted and the cheri people remain Hindus now. I cannot, however, vouch that they will continue in their Hindu faith as I notice that endeavours to bring them into the fold by such means have not dropped altogether. A development of this incident is also worth mentioning. A few weeks ago, my local agent in assigning my lands in the village for cultivation happened to allot to an inhabitant of the cheri a plot different from that he had cultivated in the previous year and there were good reasons for doing so. The Adi-Dravida was personally dissatisfied with this arrangement (though the new tenant in respect of the latter plot was also an Adi-Dravida) and sent word to me that if the last year's arrangement was not restored, he would become a convert to Christianity. My answer to him naturally was that he might do as he pleased. I might say that I had mentioned the fact of the averted conversion of the cheri to my friend, Rao Bahadur M. C. Raja, immediately after the incident.

A DISTINGUISHED INTERNATIONALIST.

The International Co-operative Women's Guild has sustained a great and irreparable loss in the recent death (August 14, 1935) in Paris, after many months illness, of Miss A. Honora Enfield, one of the founders of this organisation and for many years its Secretary. Miss Enfield was for many years active in the trade union and women's movements and on many other bodies engaged in social work, but during the latter years of her life she was above all an enthusiastic worker in the Co-operative Movement. Her work with Miss Llewelyn Davies, Secretary of the English Women's Co-operative Guild, gave her an insight into the high ideals and practical value of the Co-operative Movement and from the time she herself took up the General Secretaryship of the English Guild she became first and foremost a Co-operator.

Miss Enfield possessed wide knowledge and extensive culture and spoke and wrote English, French and German. She most concerned herself with endeavouring to spread co-operative ideals and working for peace and disarmament, for she was a pacifist from deep inner conviction and nothing could shake her belief that eventually world-peace must become a fact. She was tireless in her efforts to find new means of preparing the way for this great ideal and even during the last few years when she was often in ill-health she worked unceasingly to achieve her aims.

Miss Enfield was born in 1882 at Nottingham. She was educated at St. Leonard's School, St. Andrews, Scotland; Somerville College Oxford; took examination for Pass Degree before degrees were actually awarded to women, taught for several years in secondary schools and did some historical research work.

She was actively interested in international questions since 1903, and was a member of the National Peace Council for several years. From 1913-1917 she was on the staff of the National Federation of Women Workers, and did important work in connection with the administration of the National Health Insurance Acts. From 1917-1922 she was Private Secretary to Miss Llewelyn Davies and from 1922-1926 she was General Secretary of the Women's Co-operative Guild. She was also Secretary of the International Co-operative Women's Guild from its foundation in 1921 until her death in 1935.

She was a member of the International Institute for the Study of Co-operation and also of the International Industrial Relations Institute. Miss Enfield was on the Committee of the Electrical Association for Women, London.

A convinced pacifist and during the war years strongly anti-war, she was first attracted to the Co-operative Movement because of its great value, as a force for Peace. She joined its ranks in the latter years of the war and was firmly convinced that only a wider application of co-operative principles and the co-operative economic system could bring harmony into world relations.

IRELAND AND THE BRITISH EMPIRE.

Michael Collins, the distinguished Irish leader and one of the participants in the Anglo-Irish discussions which preceded the Irish treaty, submitted the following memorandum which we reprint below from the "Life of Lord Birkenhead" by his son:—

For centuries England strove to reduce Ireland to the position of an English province. Irish civilisation was to be blotted out. The Gael was to go. Irish lands were to be given to aliens. Irish industries were to be destroyed. Irish development was to be prevented. Ireland was to be utilised according to the Colonial policy to feed and enrich England.

A paper in the Record Office dated 1726 says: "All advantageous projects for commercial gain in any Colony which are truly prejudicial to and inconsistent with the interests of the mother country must be understood to be illegal and the practice of them unwarrantable because they contradict the end for which the colonies had a being."

This policy was first applied to all the Colonies including the American Colonies. But it broke down over the American Colonies. Though they were founded by English Colonists and peopled largely by their descendants, the Colonists were not willing to exist solely for the purpose of feeding and enriching a mother country, and they fought for and won their independence.

Ireland has never been a British Colony. She has been a separate nation kept subject by a more powerful neighbour for that neighbour's own advantage but she has never ceased to fight for her freedom and now, after centuries of political struggle and armed conflict, she has won independence. The British people hardly realise the change which has come, and the nature of the new era which is dawning not only for the two islands but for the whole world.

All former phases of the Anglo-Irish struggle—the independence of Grattan's Parliament extorted under pressure of the Irish Volunteers during England's period of danger from Europe and America; the Act of Union revoking England's pledged promises; Home Rule Bills representing merely the exigencies of British party politics—all these are now seen to have been but incidents in the English claim to control Ireland's destinies in England's interests. Forced by circumstances England has now in substance renounced that claim; and the business of the Irish Conference is to shape the form of the partnership or alliance in which two peoples of equal nationhood may be associated for the benefit of both.

While Anglo-Irish relations have taken on this aspect with an apparent suddenness which is almost bewildering to the ordinary British mind, it happens that at the same moment the relations between Great Britain and the Dominions, have, by a different process, reached a stage in which the finding of a solution is almost as urgent in the interests of British security and world peace.

The history of Ireland as an ancient independent nation which is now at last receiving recognition, is utterly different from that of the Colonies who have gradually outgrown the tutelage of their mother country.

The Colonies, as full grown children, are restive under any appearance of parental restraint, though willing to co-operate with the parent on an equal footing in regard to all family affairs.

Ireland, as a separate nation, would be also restive under any control from the neighbouring nation, but equally willing to co-operate in free association on all matters which would be naturally the common concern of two nations living so closely together. The problem on both sides can only be solved by recognising without limitation the complete independence of the several countries, and only on that basis can they all be associated together by ties of co-operation and friendship. The only association which it will be satisfactory to Ireland to enter will be based, not on the present technical legal status of the Dominions, but on the real position they claim, and have in fact secured. It is essential that the present de facto position should be recognised de jure, and that all its implications as regards sovereignty, allegiance, constitutional independence of the governments, should be acknowledged.

An association on the foregoing conditions would be a novelty in the world. But the world is looking for such a development, and it is necessary if the old world of internecine conflict is to emerge into the new world of co-operative harmony. For such an association would be the pattern for national co-operation on a wider scale, and might form the nucleus of a real League of Nations of the world....

Into such a League might not America be willing to enter? By doing so America would be on the way to secure the world ideal of free, equal and friendly nations on which her aspirations are so firmly fixed. Ireland's inclusion as a free member of this League would have a powerful influence in consolidating the whole body, for Ireland is herself a mother-country with world-wide influences, and it is scarcely to be doubted that, were she a free partner in the League as sketched, the Irish in America would surely wish America to be associated in such a combination. In that League the Irish in Ireland would be joined with Irish in America and they would both share in a common internationality with the people of America, England, and the other free nations of the League... If America were able to enter such a League, a further move would be made towards world peace, already begun by the agreement to be arrived at in the Washington Conference in regard to the scrapping of warships, and in addition, would lead through the improved relationship to a condition of financial accommodation and stability.

Mr. Lloyd George's invitation to the Irish representatives to consider how association with the nations of the British Commonwealth can best be reconciled with Irish national aspirations, makes it necessary to consider how far the members of the group have attained to independent nationality and what further steps should be taken to declare and secure such a standard of independence.

Indian Students Abroad:—Dr. Thomas Quayle, of the Education department of the office of the High Commissioner for India, in his report on Indian students abroad, made out a strong case for restricting the number of students going abroad for higher studies from India and urged that the universities should make it a point to explore the possibilities of finding employment for the foreign returned students. The consensus of opinion among Vice-Chancellors of Universities in India is of the emphatic view that parents should use a little more discrimination in deciding to send their children abroad for higher studies, only students of above average intelligence and cleverness with financial backing should undertake foreign trip, that before deciding on going abroad for further studies they should consult the foreign bureaus attached to the universities and that students as far as possible should not look to Government employment only but be independent and try to take to business.

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Sept. 14

THE INDIAN EDITOR.

The recent Journalists Conference at Calcutta provided a platform for Indian Journalists to discuss their problems. The late Mr. K. Subba Rao in his fascinating book, "Revived Memories," discusses Mr. G. Subramania Iyer's attitude on many of these questions. Mr. K. Subba Rao writes on the duties of an editor:—

"What is the duty of an Editor of a daily paper in India at the present day, that, of an Indian paper, in the true sense of the term without being contaminated or controlled by extraneous funds, or influences or supervision? Is it merely to furnish his readers with the latest news and satisfy their thirst after the every day happenings in all parts of the world? Or is it in addition to trumpet forth the utterances and actions of high-placed officials? Or is it, in addition to the above two functions, also to reflect public opinion? What is the precise annotation of this much-abused term? Or is it also, in addition to the above three terms, to lead public opinion in wholesome channels, to suggest improvements, organise new forces, and to assume the high and distinguished role of a teacher and instructor of mankind, and in that capacity to exercise, without fear and within the limits of the law of the land and subject to its penalty, the power of admonition and reprimand, of expostulation and protest, irrespective of all considerations save what he feels as the inevitable minimum in regard to the subject of everyday controversy? Opinions of even the best educated Indians and Englishmen have often differed widely in the answers to the above weighty questions. No two men agreed. Especially those interested or taking part in public movements argued the points, each in his own favour. If a speaker or writer was of the same view as the editor, he applauded him to the skies. He had no objection to elevate the Editor (or those who write for him) to the status of an uncrowned dictator with almost unlimited discretion. Those, however, who personally and sincerely, as the result of their own reflection, study and experience, differed from the policy of the paper, protested vociferously against what they conceived to be an arbitrary exercise of editorial discretion. In their view the Editor should, like the President of the Legislative Assemblies or the Speaker of the House of Commons, simply guide the discussion, without any visible leanings of his own on either side. That is what they termed the reflection of public opinion. An Editor is a mere mirror which shows to you your own face, without calling it ugly or beautiful. G. Subramania Iyer, however, early in his day revolted against mere dissemination of news or the mere reflection of public opinion. He stoutly maintained, and maintained it against the most powerful odds, that it was one of the most sacred and one of the most solemn duties of an Indian Journalist of the present day to lead public opinion and to mould it on the lines best suited for the immediate needs of the country. Such an assumption was sure to bring in its train heavy responsibilities and to subject the journalist to the severest tests of scrutiny. All the discontented elements were waiting for an opportunity to test his sincerity and self-sacrifice when fitting opportunities offered themselves. When a journalist meekly expresses the views of other people without any sermons of his own and when he effectively ignores all their defects, he is a persona grata generally. But when he presumes to be wiser than the wisest of his so-called following, a presumption inevitably present in his attempt to lead others to accept his own view, he naturally exposes himself to the most virulent criticisms of the section whose predilections and interests are opposed to his policy."

Mr. Subba Rao relates an interesting conversation which he had with Mr. G. Subramania Iyer on the proper relation of the Indian Press with the Government. He writes:—

"Our Rulers," said Mr. Subramania Iyer, "are very strong in qualities in which we are very weak. Their intense love of their own country, their passionate pride of their own achievements and greatness, their unsurpassed courage, and their inordinate love of their own race, as against all coloured people, all these would suffice to cause dismay in us; generally the weaker, when he becomes a comrade of the stronger sinks, into insignificance. We are apt to forget or ignore altogether at once all about our country, our culture and our future. Our independent and natural growth will be impeded. We would always require some mightier force on which to hang ourselves; someone to lean on till eternity. We would require benefactors and can never stand on our own legs. What we have to acquire is the power of standing erect on our own unaided legs and ability to manage our own affairs. This is not possible if we always depend on the smiles and frowns of our Rulers. They will be perfectly justified in taking all possible advantage in tightening their hold on us. In fact we will have to surrender our judgment to their sweet pleasure in all matters affecting the vital interests of the country. The so-called independence which we may manifest for stage purposes, will not stand scrutiny. Like a house of cards, it will collapse at mere touch,"—a reasoned political philosophy, based on no hatred or vile sentiment, but solely on the desire to cultivate the supreme virtue of relying on ourselves.

One of the most difficult duties of journalists is to write obituary articles. Mr. G. Subramania Iyer held strong views on this point. Mr. Subba Rao writes:—

"Even highly intellectual Indians, at times, were very hard on Mr. G. Subramania Iyer and bitterly resented his policy of exposing the foibles and follies of his own countrymen. One morning four or five of my acquaintances of Triplicane and Mylapore, very cultured men, called on me as if on a deputation, and opened a mighty crusade against the policy of the Hindu in one respect. Their complaint was as follows:—

"The Hindu is our national asset. We all feel a genuine pride and pleasure in reading the paper. But at times our patience is sorely tried. When high placed Indians who have achieved success as lawyers, statesmen, merchant princes, officials or members of any other profession, die, the Hindu the very evening contains long obituary notices, depicting vividly both their virtues and vices, success and failure. Nothing is more repulsive to Indian sentiment than to utter disapprobation against the dead. We cremate our dear one and return home to find solace and sympathy from all around us, what do we find on that very evening? Comes the Hindu with its unrelenting invectives. The praise bestowed on the deceased loses all its charm by the way in which the lapses are portrayed. Can you not realise what intense humiliation and inexpressible grief this causes in the entire family circle, and among all the friends and acquaintances of the deceased? How do you justify such a lamentable policy?"

"I said in reply, "I quite sympathise with you. At times, when I pass the proof, similar objections strike me. But I have never had any discussion with the Editor about this. Can you not see him in person and have a frank talk with him on the subject?" The leader of the deputation said: "That is very fine. You have not yet fully understood your Editor. He is a man of unbending temperament."

The more we protest, the stronger will be his persistence in his own policy." I asked them: "Why do you not please put your thoughts on paper and send it to the office? The Editor will surely publish your views." My friend said: "That is of no use. Generally in all public controversies, the Editor has the last word. He would write a strong damning editorial note or add a stinging foot-note and we are made to cut a sorry figure in public. We have come to you merely to request you to discuss the subject with the Editor to bring him round gently to our views or let us know on what principles he justifies his present policy." I agreed to undertake this interesting work of friendly reconciliation. A day or two after, I called on Mr. G. Subramania Iyer one morning at his house. He always knew that, unless sent for by him or unless I had some thing very urgent to communicate to him, I would never disturb him in the morning, when he was invariably very busy. I explained the object of my interview. He explained his policy as follows:

"I place the highest value on our national progress. Nothing is dearer to me than the bright future of India. This is our highest and most cherished ideal. All personal considerations are insignificant. I want to impress on my countrymen, high and low that, whenever any man's career or conduct runs counter to national interests, he can expect no mercy from us, however high he may be. When a man dies, we can review his work fully. We cannot take his name subsequently. The dead do not care for what we write. Let the living take a lesson from our policy. Let both young and old, who like to leave a good name behind them, never forget their sacred obligation to their motherland. Let all feel that even when they die, their defects—if they injure the national cause or national self-respect—will not be forgiven. Let those, who desire to stand well in the opinion of their countrymen after their death remember their duty to India. Self-seeking tendencies and belittling public interests have to be fully exposed. It is with great regret that I am writing these obituary notices. But I cannot help it. The feelings of the near and dear ones are as nothing to me when compared with the permanent injury to national interests which some of our eminent men have purposely and consciously done, either for their own advancement or for fear of wounding the delicate and divine susceptibilities of the Members of the Government. If you and your friends still think I am in the wrong, let me have your reasons." It struck me that G. Subramania Iyer was in the right. I told him so and informed my friends. They reluctantly but fully admitted that G. Subramania Iyer could not be ousted from the position he had taken up, if the progress of India were the one supreme consideration in deciding the policy."

Pennsylvania Grants Freedom to Negroes:—The 450,000 negroes who live in the State of Pennsylvania have found themselves from last Sunday in a state of absolute equality with their White brethren. Every hotel by law has opened its doors to them. No public swimming bath can exclude them. In trains and buses they can sit where they please. In theatres, in all places of public entertainment, they can take their seat next to a White woman without the manager of the hall daring to say them nay. First September was the day in which the State's Negro Equality Bill recently rushed through both the Houses of the State Legislature, became law.

NOTES

The League of Nations:—The League of Nations Assembly meeting this time was enlivened by some speeches which revived the almost lost hopes of its proving to be a palladium of peace among the nations of the world which President Wilson intended it to be. As His Highness the Aga Khan, the leader of the Indian Delegation, feelingly remarked, the repeated failures of the League to exert its authority for checking aggression by powerful nations on weaker ones, have led to loss of faith in it by his countrymen who have come to regard it as a costly futility. If the League asserted itself on the present occasion, its waning prestige might be revived. The cabled summary of the Aga Khan's speech does not tell us what the Indian representative thought of Sir Samuel Hoare's principal suggestion that backward nations should be helped to develop their material resources without detriment to their political sovereignty and that that was the policy which Britain had laid down for herself in India and elsewhere. As we observed last week, even though it has not been followed in the past, the enunciation of this policy is valuable as a pledge of Britain's relations with her colonies in the future. The Russian delegate, Litvinoff, made the most remarkable speech of the Session so far. He declared that the Soviets did not approve of colonial imperialism, of which there is too much already, and would do all in their power to prevent aggravation of it by Italy's contemplated raid on Abyssinia. Not less explicit, though marred by allusion to Ireland's grievances, was Mr. De Valera's strong condemnation of the impending aggression on Abyssinia. A considerable volume of opinion expressed at the Assembly was decidedly condemnatory of Italian aggression. But such glimpses of the plan of meeting it as are afforded to the outside public, seem to indicate that Britain and France, at present the dominant factors in the League, are engaged in securing for Italy without a war the main objectives which Italy hopes to gain by a war. That is to say, they agree that Abyssinia should be exploited by European nations without involving the latter in quarrels among themselves. To avert a war in Europe rather than to protect the interests of Abyssinia seems to be the object of the discussions in the Committee of five appointed by the Assembly to make proposals, for a peaceful termination of the Italo-Abyssinian crisis. Only nominal sovereignty will be left to Abyssinia when her administration and resources are to be developed by foreigners. The Emperor is anxious to develop his country on Western lines and is willing to accept western guidance. The British position in Iraq seems to be the model prominently in view before the League Committee.

India and Abyssinia:—The organisation known as "Italian Community in India" has issued a tract headed "Much Ado about Nothing" in which the right of India to voice its opinion on the projected invasion of Abyssinia by Italy, is challenged. India, we are told, is neither judge nor defendant in the Italo-Abyssinian conflict. She has no political, or moral or economic interest in Africa. She has no foreign policy of her own, not even the thin link of direct diplomatic contacts with Abyssinia. The writer magnanimously dismisses the thought that India's protest has no higher motive than to advertise herself. The true reason, he says, is that the political mind of India is still sticking to 1789, and is obsessed by the French Revolutionary watchwords, which have no meaning nowadays. "They do not think that, after 150 years of history, these words (democracy, universal suffrage, government of the people, parliamentarism and so on) have become tools for rendering nations to slavery than to redeem them and make them feel really happy." These words open up a large field of argument. We will only say here that India, though she occupies only a subordinate position politically, has as large a moral interest as any other country, in the maintenance of just relations between nation and nation. The very fact that her interests are not directly involved in the present conflict, invests her judgment of it with the impartiality of history—a word which is frequently used but not quite clearly understood by the writer of this interesting tract. At the same time, there is considerable truth in his observation that the old watchwords about democracy, have resulted not in freedom and happiness but oppression of the weak by the strong in many parts of the world. But Fascism has yet to prove that it is better able than parliamentary democracy to ensure freedom and happiness to mankind. On the principle that each country has the right to determine the form of government best suited to its aptitudes and requirements, the Reformer has consistently refrained from adverse criticism of Fascism, Nazism and Sovietism. It has, on the contrary, recorded from time to time the beneficent achievements of these experiments in their respective countries. It is only when Italian Fascism seeks to overstep its territorial limits and to absorb a distant country, inhabited by a race with which it has no affinities, that we felt constrained to criticise its armies in Abyssinia. Soviet Russia has condemned colonial imperialism outright. German desire to be united to Austria is intelligible both because of the racial identity of the two peoples and because Austria, as defined by the Versailles Treaty, cannot exist economically except in union with her great neighbour. None of these considerations is present in the case of Italian intentions on Abyssinia. If Italians want to help Abyssinia they should do so by becoming subjects of the Emperor and not by overthrowing his authority.

“Historical Justice”:—The writer of the Italian tract says that justice is a relative notion and that the only real justice is the “Justice of history which transcends centuries and rules over the world, thanks to which people assert their right of life and civilisation through wars and revolutions.” If that be the case, the justice of history had many centuries ago decided that the Roman Empire over the world should end and that Italy should become a province of the Austro-Hungarian Empire. Mazzini, Garibaldi and Cavour did not accept this “justice of history” and wrote and fought and wrought for its reversal. How are we to know whether Signor Mussolini’s mind reflects historical justice more truly than those of these great Italians. Would Mazzini—the great apostle of freedom—have approved of this aggression on Abyssinia? The writer of the “Much Ado About Nothing” tract puts some questions to Indian publicists. Why did they not protest against the Aryan invasion of India, he asks. Obviously because it is rather too late to protest against it. The so-called Aryan invasion, by the way, is a purely western hypothesis for which there is not an atom of proof in ancient Indian literature. What of the Muslim invasion, he asks. This, again, is ancient history now. But does Signor Mussolini intend to remove his capital to Addis Ababa as the Muslims did to Agra and settle down there as an African ruler as they did? As for the British conquest the answer can best be given in the words of the English historian, Seeley; “We are really not conquerors of India, and we cannot rule her as conquerors; if we undertook to do so, it is not necessary to enquire whether we could succeed, for we should assuredly be ruined financially by the mere attempt.” Queries the indignant Italian communalist: “Did India ever stir when Japan occupied Manchuria and went out of the League of Nations to have a free hand in China?” There is an answer to that, too. Chinese, Japanese and Manchurians have racial and cultural affinities. Japan is, therefore, naturally more fitted to help them in their development than the Western nations which would have otherwise exploited these countries. This, and the fact that Japanese are debarred from settling in America and Australia, had the effect of moderating Indian disapproval of Japanese expansion in Manchuria. Italy has tried to arouse hostility to Japan among European nations, but she has failed because thoughtful men in Europe and America recognise that the ban on Japan leaves her without an outlet anywhere else. Italians can go anywhere they like. Millions of them have made their homes in America. There is no bar against their emigrating to Australia or South Africa or Canada. Why do they covet the land of the Negus, the solitary remnant of ancient African sovereignty? India has a strong feeling for ancient institutions, which is outraged by the contemplated attack on Abyssinia.

The Tariff Board :—When Discriminate Protection was adopted as the policy of the Government of India, it became necessary to create an agency to find out which Industry fulfilled the conditions laid down as entitling industries to protection. The Tariff Board came into existence. The first Boards were expert bodies of high standing with the public. The members were appointed for a fixed term and had a certain fixity of tenure. Of late, however the tendency is to make casual appointments for each inquiry. It is impossible for any body of principles to grow up under this plan. There is no permanence in appointments to the Board. Two recent nominations to the Board have called forth criticism. A retired British owner of Jute Mills in Calcutta has been selected to be chairman of the Board, to enquire into the claim of the Textile Industry for protection. This, in the first place, is an injustice to Mr. Fazl Rahimtulla who has remained a member of the Board through its several transformations. In the next place, the ex-jute merchant, having retired from India some years ago, has probably lost touch with recent developments in Indian industries. There is much force in the contention of the President of the Indian Merchants’ Chamber that, if it was absolutely necessary to have a British Chairman, one could and should have been selected from among those who are actively engaged in business in India. The second appointment that invites criticism is that of Dewan Bahadur

A. Ramswami Mudaliar. The Dewan Bahadur is a very able man. He was a candidate for election to the Legislative Assembly last year and appreciative comments on some of his election speeches were published in the Reformer. He was defeated at the election by a very large majority. He has since become the chief organiser and propagandist of the Justice Party. Government frequently express their fear of political influence intruding in fiscal and industrial administration. They seem to have overlooked their own precept in the present case.

The Poona Seva Sadan :—The Silver Jubilee Album of the Poona Seva Sadan Society is a sumptuous volume of over 200 pages. A valuable introduction containing a short account of the aims and the gradual progress of the Society's activities from small beginnings, is followed by numerous photographs of persons connected in one way or another with the movement. The provision of general and vocational education for adult women, which is the main object of the Society, was a novel idea twenty-five years ago, and the attempt to give it body and form was beset with many difficulties. But the patience and perseverance of Mr. Gopal Krishna Devadhar have triumphed through all obstacles and today the Society with fourteen centres, three of them outside Maharashtra, has provided thousands of women with the training which enables them to serve their sisters in educational, medical and other spheres. Mr. Devadhar has been greatly helped in his arduous labours by Mrs. Janakibai Bhatt and other women workers. As President of the Servants of India Society, as organizing Secretary of the Poona Seva Sadan, and as one of the few leading authorities on the Co-operative Movement, Mr. Devadhar is one of the heaviest worked men in India at the present day. Congratulations from all well-wishers of the Seva Sadan have been poured on him on the occasion of the Silver Jubilee. He makes an appeal for funds to meet the demands on the Society for further expansion and we trust that it will meet with generous response. The Album is priced Rs. 10 (postage Rs. 1-4).

Sarda Act Amendment Bill :—Mr. B. Das has obtained the sanction of the Governor-General for introducing in the Legislative Assembly a Bill for amending the Sarda Act. We publish it elsewhere with the explanatory statement attached to it. The main provisions of it relate to the granting of injunction prohibiting a contemplated marriage in contravention of the law, the giving of power to the Court to take proceedings under the Act of its own motion, and the discretion vested in the Court to require the postponement of the consummation of a child marriage until after the age prescribed by the Act or until a later date. The Bill omits to provide against having a child marriage performed in foreign territory. This is a common form of evasion. The Bombay High Court recently overruled the decision of a District Court making such evasions punishable. Presumably, injunctions under the amending Act will be issuable against marriages arranged to be performed outside as well as within the India. The last provision is very necessary and was recommended by the Age of Consent Committee.

Spurious Conversions to other Faiths :—The Indian Messenger writes: "Spurious conversions to other faiths for the sake of some ulterior motives were not very rare in this country. People have come to realise the baneful effects of such conversions. Our contemporary The Guardian has pointed it out in an editorial note. This is sound advice. Brahmo Samaj has in the past, had some bitter experience of, such hasty conversions with selfish motives, and the warning of our contemporary has not come too soon. Those, who are truly alive to the best interests of the Samaj, have to look askance upon all efforts of conversion of this kind and prevent it with a strong hand, if necessary, so that the reputation of the community as a religious body may not be sullied by these nefarious activities of self-seeking men and women."

Untouchables in the Making :—There is much speculation as to how the practice of untouchability originated in this country. In his study of ancient institutions, Sir Henry Maine laid great stress on what is known as the historical method. The origin of ancient institutions are often traceable in institutions actually existing in some part of the world. The past was thus the present. A good illustration of this with reference to the institution of untouchability is to be found in what is taking place before our eyes in Nazi Germany. We print elsewhere the marriage and citizenship laws promulgated within the last few days at Nuremberg where Herr Hitler proclaimed the policy of the Nazi state. Citizenship of Germany is now denied and is confined to Germans or people of 'kindred blood' whatever that might mean. Jews are forbidden to marry Germans and marriages solemnised outside in contravention of this law are invalid. Illicit sexual intercourse between Jews and Germans or 'kindred' people is punished with penal servitude. Jews cannot employ German girls in their homes and they are forbidden to hoist the German flag or hoist the national colours. This and other laws and regulations practically reduces, as was stated in a manifesto issued by the Jews, the community to a position worse than that of the untouchables in India. The German are a highly cultured and in the forefront of Western civilisation, not priest-ridden, superstitious idolators like the unfortunate caste-Hindus. Why then do they treat the Jews worse than pariahs used to be treated in India? The answer to this question will probably give us a clue to the origin of untouchability in India. It must be remembered that although anti-Semitism is acute in Germany, it is more or less chronic in Europe.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

BOMBAY, September 21, 1935.

WHO SHOULD WORK THE REFORMS?

Indian public men who feel called upon to advise the country as to what its response should be to the Samuel Hoare Scheme, should have regard not only to the immediate future but also to what may come after it. If ever a satisfactory relationship is to be established between Britain and India, between the West and the East, the first and most urgent need is that each should take the other to mean what it says. At the present time this is unhappily not the case. The British, and Europeans generally, expect the East to take them to mean precisely what they say. But they do not reciprocate the compliment. With reference to the Hoare reforms, it has been persistently asserted by British statesmen, with brutal frankness by some and in more or less courteous language by others, that Indian leaders were not sincere in their opposition to the scheme, that there was no need to pay attention to them, and that they would accept whatever was decided upon and presented to them as an accomplished fact. Indian leaders have not all condemned the scheme. Muslims have on the whole accepted it. The Justice party in Madras has not only accepted it but has constituted itself its champion against all comers. Dr. Ambedkar's is the one non-official name cited by Sir Samuel Hoare as a supporter of his scheme and "the scheduled castes", whom he represented at the Round Table Conference, should be assumed to favour it. The Europeans, of course, support the reforms. Outside these elements, disapproval of the scheme has been the rule. There are notable exceptions particularly among those who took part in one or more Round Table Conferences, as delegates or associates. Liberals have been as vehement in protest as Congressmen. It is of them specifically that British protagonists of the reforms, have declared that they would come round when the Bill was put upon the statute book. If these leaders now accept the reforms and undertake to execute them, the opinion of British statesmen that Indian protesters should not be taken seriously will be confirmed. The next time any proposal is made, whether within or outside the Act, it will be open to them to point to their experience and carry it over the heads of protesters. Not only will future expressions of public opinion be discounted, but Indians will acquire a character for "bluffing," the effect of which will go far beyond political controversy. If Indian leaders can back out of their strong words of condemnation, when a proposal is pushed through in spite of their disapproval, a premium is placed on irresponsibility. The public cannot rely on their spokesmen to stand by their convictions or what were proclaimed as their convictions. Consistency is not everything. It is, some one has said, the bugbear of small minds. The leader of men will not hesitate to change his course when new circumstances, not originally contemplated, demand a change. But that is quite a different thing from changing his course when what has happened is what he knew all along would happen. To be inconsistent on principle, is poor title to leadership.

Compromise, it is true, is the soul of politics. It is also the soul of life. We have to make adjustments constantly to our surroundings in order merely to live. In fact, life is nothing more than this capacity to adjust itself to variations in environment. But the adjustments of life have for their purpose the strengthening, the enrichment of vitality, of personality. An adjustment, a compromise, which resulted in the weakening or impoverishment of an organism, is maladjustment, suicide. Compromise is possible and legitimate when the parties to it are agreed upon a common end. No compromise is possible when there is no such common purpose. Can we say this of the Hoare Scheme? What is the central purpose of constitutional as distinct from absolute government? It is that the governed have the determining voice in the making of the laws which they have to obey, in the raising of the taxes which they have to pay and in the spending of them. All else is subsidiary. Does the Hoare Act concede this? Lord Lothian, who is not a mere party politician but a man of intellectual and moral calibre, avows in an article in the Twentieth Century, as a conclusive answer to all criticisms of the Hoare Act, that it places the "initiative" in Indian hands. But what is the good of giving the Indians the wheel after taking good care to remove the engine and to puncture the tyres of the car of State? With the Governor on the top of him and the steel frame at the seat of him, the Indian Minister will have about as much initiative as the corn between the upper and nether millstones. We have in mind chiefly the reforms at the centre, though the observations apply also to the provincial part of the scheme. The scheme should be judged by its proposals for the centre. Provincial autonomy without responsibility at the centre, is dangerous if it be real, and if not dangerous it is unreal. Autonomy by itself would be beneficial if it were by devolution from a unitary central government. But in the Hoare Scheme separation is more real than autonomy for the provinces. The provinces have been separated in order to put them on the same level with the States with which they are to federate. But does the Act put them on the same level as States? It is obvious to the most casual observation that the new scheme opens wide the door of diplomacy, extra-constitutional propaganda, backstairs approaches. The provincial governments in all these respects will be under a tremendous handicap as compared with many States.

The right thing in the circumstances is to leave those who believe in the scheme, the Muslims, the "scheduled castes," the Justice party, to "work" it, and for the others to render them such help as they can in carrying forward measures which are for the good of the country, like prohibition, national education and the economic regeneration of the people. If they succeed, well and good. If they fail, it can not be said that the reforms have not had a fair trial as it will certainly be said if those who have condemned them all long, undertake to "work" them whether with the avowed object of wrecking them or with a strong conviction that they are bound to fail.

THE VICEROY'S ADDRESS TO THE LEGISLATURE.

The address which Lord Willingdon delivered at a joint meeting of the Indian Legislative Assembly and the Council of State on Monday, was a long tale of frustrated purpose. His Excellency, since he assumed office, has repeatedly declared his intention to see India firmly planted on the road to self-government with himself as the first constitutional Governor-General during his term of five years. It is chiefly on this hope that he has justified his many Ordinances. The Ordinances have been incorporated into the permanent criminal law. Lord Willingdon has this week certified the renewal of this law on its being rejected by the Legislative Assembly. But the constitutional Governor-General is still remote. Even the introduction of the Hoare scheme has been taken out of His Excellency's hands and entrusted to his successor whose nomination has been made with unprecedented, not to say indecent, haste. Lord Willingdon reserved reference to the appointment of his successor, while he has yet several months of office to run, almost to the end of his address after enlarging on such questions as the "quinization" of the population by a free gift of unsaleable surplus stores of that now obsolete drug, development of broadcasting, the collection of a crore of rupees for the King's Jubilee Fund, and other odds and ends. His tribute to Lord Linlithgow was noticeably cold. He referred to him as one having technical knowledge of the Reforms which is excellent in an adviser but rather dangerous in a statesman. The Viceroy of India can avail himself of the services of experts. But he must be their master and not a technician himself. "Beware of your experts," wrote the great Lord Salisbury from India Office in London to Lord Lytton at the Viceregal Lodge at Simla. There is a note of sadness in Lord Willingdon's reference to the appointment of his successor. "It will not be my task to introduce the new constitution nor to join with you in its constitutional and, I trust, harmonious development." Is there also a note of relief? His Excellency's loyal endeavour to magnify the new constitution, notwithstanding his reference to Asoka, is too obviously forced.

Lord Willingdon told his hearers that their thoughts were engaged as his were by forecasts of the steps by which and at which the new constitution will be brought into operation. This must have been news to many of them. His Excellency is a bad thought reader. Very few people in India are thinking of the scheme and when and how it comes into operation. Many people are hoping that it will never come into operation and that the princes will find some patriotic way of blocking it. If we may presume on a word of advice, it is that Lord Willingdon too should not weary his mind by speculating on events which he will not be here to shape. "It is impossible for me," said His Excellency, "to give any indication of precise dates." So much the better. As the late Lord Birkenhead wisely remarked, let us not be slave to dates. One date is as good as another—we do not consult astrologers to find an auspicious day and hour—and so far as India is concerned it is all the same whether the scheme is applied tomorrow or after many years. Lord Willingdon found two special merits in the scheme which should commend it to India. With his well-known genius to derive satisfaction in all situations, His Excellency declared that it was a matter of great satisfaction to him that during his Viceroyalty there had been made possible a consummation which many of the great rulers of India through the ages desired to see but did not see and which was hardly in sight when "I myself took office over five years ago." The emergence of Federation which to Lord Willingdon seems to be little short of a miracle, has been explained by others who were behind the scenes as having had a more prosaic origin. Repeated and solemn pledges had been given promising responsible government to British India. The attempt to explain them away had failed. It could no longer be withheld except by a flagrant breach of these promises. Federation suggested itself as the way by which responsible government can be associated with irresponsibility so as completely to neutralise it. The second great feature of the scheme is, said His Excellency, that the Government of India under the new constitution will draw their authority by direct devolution from the Crown just as the Dominion Governments do. The Irish Constitution is the one which we have at hand and it is the latest in the roll of Dominions. The second article of the Irish Free State Act says that "all powers of government and all authority, legislative, executive and judicial in Ireland, are derived from the people of Ireland." The case of India is more analogous to that of Ireland than to that of any other Dominion. Michael Collins in the memorandum which we reproduced from Lord Birkenhead's Life in the last issue, spoke of his country being an ancient, independent nation which is now at last receiving recognition. This is the view we have all along taken of the future of India in the British Commonwealth.

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Sept. 21

AN EVANGELIST LOOKS BACK.

The atheist has derived so much amusement at the expense of the devout that something had to be done to restore the self-confidence of the believer. Mr. Allan A. Hunter, a missionary with wide experience, remarked in "Social Perplexities" that a friend of his traced the atheism of an eminent philanthropist to a vicious kink in his home life. Dr. Sherwood Eddy caps this comforting reassurance with a personal anecdote, in his autobiography, "A Pilgrimage of Ideas" (Messrs. George Allen and Unwin, London; Price, 10s. 6d.). Unable to argue a student into theistic belief, Dr. Eddy turned him over to Dr. Frank Buchman of Oxford Group fame. Dr. Eddy continues, "In the next room he began again jauntily, 'I am an atheist,' etc. Buchman said quietly, 'My friend, you are an adulterer. Let's get down first to your basic moral need where you are living, and then later we'll talk about your "atheism" which is probably only a symptom of your immoral life.' 'How do you know I'm an adulterer?' asked the man. 'Because it's written all over your face,' replied Buchman. The man admitted the fact, got down to reality in dealing with his moral need, and then found his "atheism" as a superficial doubt or unconscious pose had somehow evaporated." Not all adventures at spiritual diagnosis are likely to have the same happy, from Dr. Buchman's point of view, ending. Dr. Eddy whose reminiscences are a fascinating blend of caution and enthusiasm, hints to his reader in narrating the incident the needed warning that all men are not as Frank Buchman. He might have also added that all atheists are not like the student, that even among adulterers there are types.

Dr. Eddy's caution is the result of experience. His enthusiasm is inherent. His account of an encounter with Swami Vivekananda on board ship from Madras to Calcutta on the Swami's return from his triumphal visit to Chicago, would have offended Indian sentiment but for the detachment of the writer. He challenged the Swami to a debate before the entire ship's company on deck. "I felt," he remarks with charming candour, "like a young Samson smiting with the jawbone of an ass, contending with this brilliant and subtle Vedantist. But as I see myself now I was the ass, boneheaded beyond belief. I was sure my cause was right but I was no match for this brilliant man... I can see myself alone with the swami after the debate, when with the mein and condescension of a god incarnate he told me that he had left thousands of converts to Hinduism at Harvard and in Boston. But I was fresh from the land of Buffalo Bill. (To the uninitiated, it may be mentioned, that Buffalo Bill is the hero of numerous episodes written for juvenile consumption generally concluding on the note, 'And then another Redskin bit the dust.') Hoping to puncture his inflated composure, I leaned forward, pointed my finger in his face so that he might not mistake to whom I was alluding, and said, 'Swami, you lie.' With unbroken condescension he smiled and said pityingly, 'Young man, you need some cooling drink.' Neither that debate nor the many discussions, arguments and question meetings which followed in India—as a kind of tug of war to prove we had a better religion than they had and to expose the evils of Hinduism—ever got us far or won a single convert. I early abandoned this futile procedure of debate and argument. I am glad to see the whole method of an appreciative and sympathetic approach to the great ethnic religions is so fully recognised in the Laymen's Report and by the majority of modern missionaries." The early failure of Dr. Eddy's argumentative method led to the abandoning of a policy which was open to the strongest criticism. That is why we refuse to believe the press report that missionaries are contemplating the preparation of films to show to 'home' audiences the "wretchedness" of conditions here with a view to whipping up enthusiasm for the missionary cause. But that is by the way. Dr Eddy still bears the scar of that early encounter with Swami Vivekananda. Otherwise he would not have concluded with the uncharitable remark, "The Swami impressed me as a clever charlatan who had aspirations, nevertheless, towards the saintliness of his great master, Ramakrishna."

Dr Sherwood Eddy is revealed in his autobiography as an exponent of what may be called the modern form of muscular Christianity. He glories in numbers and success to him is counted by the thousands who are converted or who attend his meetings. One almost begins to suspect that his enthusiasm for Gandhi is because of the millions who follow him. In a discussion, as futile as the early meetings on the merits of Christianity and Hinduism, Dr. Eddy states with pathetic insistence that Hinduism could not have produced a leader like Gandhi without Christian influence. If Dr. Eddy has abandoned comparative discussions on religion, he has not given up the method. In a short account of Hindu weaknesses Dr. Eddy admits with "candour"—though why he should feel 'compelled' to confess the defects of the other man's religion, one does not understand—that 'there is a characteristic lack of any adequate power of elimination to recognize, abhor and cast out the evils of the individual and society of this great religion'. His experiences in America also show that "the Christians and idealists of the West" have a marked tendency to be occupied with their own selfish interests, yet what is human weakness he describes as Hindu weakness. Dr. Eddy has had a unique experience of life in the West and in the East but it is unfortunate that he has not given an integrated account of his 'pilgrimage.' We have as a result not the autobiography of one but of two individuals in "A Pilgrimage of Ideas." His description of himself as one whose mind is 'single-tracked' accounts for many of the seeming contradictions of his life. An evangelist of the first rank, he is prepared to leave to "the handiwork of God the simple orthodox soul (of Gandhi)" who incidentally cannot be moved from his religious position; a convinced socialist, he yet rejoices that he inherited enough from his father to live his own life: a non-violent pacifist, he threatens his hearers with an impending violent revolution, in which, of course, he will not take part, if he is not heard. But his autobiography will be read with interest as a commentary on the various movements which have sprung up during the last thirty years.

It is interesting to see Mr. Eddy attempting to help his readers to clear obstacles in the way of reading through his reminiscences. "The word 'missions' is taboo as is the word 'religion,'" he writes and justifies missions to the younger generation in the following passage: "The West had already sent abroad, perforce, its liquor, its lust, its firearms, its conquering imperialism and exploiting industrialism to enslave the sweated labour of the Orient. We felt that the West should give its best as it had already forced its worst upon the Orient... We went to build up a complete new social order in the East as now we are attempting to do in the West." All this, however, is obviously an afterthought. Western missionaries, and only the best of them at that, are only just realising that their message has little hope of acceptance unless cut loose from Western imperialism. The missionary of forty years ago, with the possible exception of Dr. Sherwood Eddy, could not have set their work in the Orient as a compensation for the industrialism and armaments which Western industrialists and militarists had thrust on the East, because the missionaries themselves believed in the civilising value of both arms and machines. As for the new social order, it was an attempt more to introduce Western social institutions. This idealised picture of 'missionary' work tells its own story. The most valuable chapters in the 'Pilgrimage', however, are those explaining Dr. Eddy's transition from Liberalism to Socialism. "Since I could not conscientiously support capitalism with its flagrant injustice," writes Dr. Eddy, "nor the desperate dictatorship of fascism, nor communism with its necessary tyranny, I turned to socialism as the nearest political approximation to my ideals." He is a little more emphatic when he says that he is no longer a liberal and that he is still left with his feet on solid ground after the trial balloons of Liberalism have been exploded by the hard facts of life. But anyone reading Dr. Eddy's 'Pilgrimage of Ideas' a hundred years hence, might be excused for mistaking the distinguished Socialist for a sentimental adherent of that creed.

THE TRUTH ABOUT CZECHOSLOVAKIA.

Mr. Subhas Chandra Bose in his statement on "Indian Propaganda abroad" (Reformer, August 10), has attempted to make out a case for conducting propaganda in foreign countries for the cause of Indian freedom. He assumes at the outset that the facts of the Indian political situation today are not known outside this country while really the reverse is the case. India has not obtained her freedom, not because there is any lack of knowledge or sympathy in other countries. His reference to China's failure to profit by international sympathy shows definitely that, for all his "careful study of the history of those countries that have won their national freedom in comparatively recent years," Mr. Bose has woefully misread the lesson of foreign politics. "Even those who rely on force of arms," he writes, "for winning their freedom, cannot dispense with propaganda and foreign sympathy which propaganda brings," and, again, "China was unable to utilise this due to her military weakness." We can only conclude that his belief in the magic efficacy of an army has led this distinguished Indian leader into so gross a lapse. Had he said "only those who rely on force of arms etc.," we should be inclined to agree with him. His reference to Czechoslovakia is inapt, for Czechoslovakia bears out our point of view rather than his. It will be interesting to see how Czechoslovakia won her freedom. As an Indian who has lived for some time in Vienna, Mr. Bose surely must know that but for the collapse of the Austro-Hungarian Dual Monarchy, Czech propaganda would have been of no avail in winning freedom. We should like to emphasise here that there is no intention in the following account to pass judgment on Czech leaders for the methods adopted by them in attaining their ideals. History has allowed herself a wide latitude in her judgment of nations struggling to free themselves from foreign domination.

When Mr. Bose remarks that "for nearly twenty years" Czech leaders conducted steady and careful propaganda in different countries, he is displaying that carelessness and superficiality which he so readily attributes to those who disagree with him. So far from there having been a conscious agitation for Czech independence in foreign countries for twenty years, the leaders themselves were only conscious of this political aim of setting up a separate State in 1914. The territory which was to be Czechoslovakia was decided by the Allies in 1918. Czech politicians, with few exceptions, took for granted the existence of the Habsburg Empire and were even reconciled to this fact, in the hope that the Czechoslovak people would attain a position such as would enable it to have a deciding influence on the future fortunes of the Austro-Hungarian

Monarchy.....In the period 1908-14, the increasing dependance of Austro-Hungary on Germany, its aggressive policy towards the Balkan States and Russia and its incapacity to solve the problem of its subject nationalities, led to a substantial change and to a radicalisation of powerful Czech political groups. The World War brought Czechoslovak politics to the cross-roads of destiny. Before, however, the politicians could agree on a definite line of action, before the masses could make known their decision, the troops who were leaving for the front manifested anti-Austrian feeling. It has been amply proved by now that all the nations entered the World War for their own ends. The Czechs and Slovaks were no more altruistic than the others. From the very beginning of the War, their soldiers who fought against Czarist Russia in the Austro-Hungarian armies, deserted en masse to the enemy. Czech Delegations approached the Czar offering to form a corps and fight for the Allies, side by side with the Russian forces. The Czar was not favourably inclined because the petitioners were republicans and also because he regarded the issue of the War as by no means certain. He had no desire to provoke the special wrath of the Austro-Hungarian Dual Monarchy by supporting one of its troublesome minorities. The Provisional Government that followed his overthrow, accepted the offer and, on the explicit understanding that the new army was to fight in France, a Czech corps was formed. Masaryk came to an agreement with the French Military Mission to send 30,000 prisoners to fight in France and French officers were attached to the corps. The army was intended only to fight against Germany and her allies. Then the Soviet Government established itself and negotiated a peace with the Central European Powers and the Czechs could no longer fight Germany on Russian soil. The Czech force was concentrated in the Ukraine which developed with surprising rapidity into a puppet state controlled by Germany. The Soviet naturally could not continue paying the Czech corps and, after negotiations at Moscow, the army went on the pay-roll of France. Pressure from the Allies to permit the use of Czech forces in Russia was resisted for a time. The corps then started for Vladivostok across Siberia on their way to France—a fantastic plan, Masaryk remarks. On the eve of this enterprise their leaders received £ 80,000 from Britain and roughly £1,164,166 from the French Consul in Moscow. The Bolshevik Government started disarming the Czechs, in accordance with a previous agreement with the leaders. The Czechs resisted although Masaryk regarded that the army needed no weapons as it would be re-equipped in France. They reached Vladivostok and occupied it. In fighting their way across Siberia they seized the railway. They then turned back and joined the White Russian, Kolchak. They arrested the local soviets in every town to which they came in East Russia and Siberia. The Czechs had become a powerful counter-revolutionary force in Russia. The Bolsheviks who feared co-operation between the Czechs and the Japanese who were pushing forward their imperialistic plans in Siberia, offered to the Allies to transport the Czechs to Archangel, a port in the North. England replied she had no free ships. The Allies did not want the Czechs to leave Russia. The leaders wanted to fight in France. Ultimately the Allies prevailed. The Czechs stayed in Russia, at the instance of France, to attack the Bolsheviks from the rear in return for recognition for "Czechoslovakia" and assistance in establishing the State. The Czech leaders had now no difficulty in the matter of funds and we find Savinkov, a White leader in Moscow, subsidised by their money in organising for a counter-revolution. The republican Czechs fought the Soviet State on behalf of Czarism. Masaryk and other leaders disapproved of the alliance with monarchist forces but such disapproval in no way changed the situation. Czechoslovakia had to pay a heavy price for Allies' support of her ambitions. Long after British and French troops were withdrawn from Russia, the Czech army was at the disposal of Kolchak, White Supreme Commander in Russia.

A MUCH-DISCUSSED FILM.

"Jawani-ka-Hawa", a production of Bombay Talkies which had attracted attention not only as the first effort of the successors to the producers of "Karma" but also because of some Parsi opposition to the inclusion of two women of that community in its cast, was released to the Bombay public on Monday. Negotiations to buy up the rights of production in Bombay with a view to preventing its release here, were carried on by the orthodox Parsis and failed at the eleventh hour. Fortunately the producers were not prepared to give up the picture for less than Rs. 40,000 and the Parsi protestants would not pay more than half that amount. It would have established a dangerous precedent. I believe, however, that had the Parsis known what part was assigned to the actress—only one of them appeared on the screen—who was the unfortunate centre of controversy, much of the agitation would not have arisen. At any rate many of the leaders of the community would have held back from the protests organised in this city. For 'Chandra Prabha', the screen name adopted by the actress, appears as Mayabai a most unobjectionable part. Whether as the mother of a wilful girl who calms the irate father, or as the mistress rebuking the gardener who presumes too much on his long service, or as the widow mourning over the death of her husband, she is exposed to none of the 'temptations' which the Parsi agitators feared for their women if they took up a screen career. Representing as she does the middle-aged virtues of a merchant's wife, Mayabai must have appealed to many of the agitators as exemplary. Nor would the Bombay Talkies have found it difficult to replace 'Chandra Prabha' had they known of Parsi sentiment beforehand. As a matter of fact the inclusion of most of the members of the cast can only be explained by the assumption that Mr. Himansu Rai the Director desired to include all communities in his portrayal of modern Indian life.

"Jawani-ka-Hawa" starts as a story with a purpose and tails off as light entertainment. The theme is a favourite one with modern Indian films—the conflict between love and an arranged marriage. It is skilfully worked to a climax in the first half of the picture. A marriage has been arranged for his daughter by a wealthy merchant. By the time the rich young bridegroom appears, the young lady has made clear her preference for another young but not so wealthy man by eloping with him. The old gardener is the sole confidant though the mother expresses her misgivings about the arranged marriage. The discovery of the bride's flight does not improve the temper of her father who, after putting off the guests with the unconvincing excuse that she is ill, sets out in pursuit. The plot now works out to its denouement through the death of the father just when he has caught up with the miscreants, the finding of his body and a Coroner's Court where the hero confesses to the murder, the heroine says she did it and a police officer fixes it on to a thief till the surgeon saves everybody from the gallows, and tracks are laid for the course of true love.

It is a tradition, not only of the Indian stage and screen, but almost of all Oriental acting, that public kissing is indecorous and should not be portrayed. Japan is said to have rejected several Western films for this reason. It is probably the outcome of the practice of having female roles enacted by men. Whatever that may be, the Indian film producer of today gets over the problem by avoiding any scenes which find their natural climax in osculation. This is an act of self-denial to Western critics but Indian audiences, even the most sophisticated, are accustomed to it and probably too close an imitation of Western films would rouse a storm of protest. Bombay Talkies have followed Oriental tradition but Victorian methods. The reticent novelist of old worked up to his climax and drew the veil by a succession of dots. Mr. Himansu Rai has no dots at his command. He simply stops photographing. Where the hero or villain, as the case may be, would kiss his heroine in a Western talkie, Mr. Rai passes on to the next scene. In "Jawani-ka-Hawa" the hero and heroine, when they are together before the cameraman, put their arms round each other, they rub cheeks, the heroine pouts, the hero gobbles till every Adam's apple in the audience moves in sympathy; but they do not kiss. This touching tribute to propriety renders these scenes inane.

The dual purpose behind the story, to amuse and to instruct, has made "Jawani-ka-Hawa" interminably long. The audience is made to accompany the runaway couple in a Tourist train for almost 7,000 of the total 14,000 and odd feet. The corridor compartments delude the cinema-fan into believing it to be a short trip and the sight of the father in hot pursuit in a car encourages the illusion but even the cabaret scenes inside the train grow tedious. The introduction of musical-comedy buffooneries and inanities are almost compensated by the excellent dancing of Auzurie but nearly all the jokes are killed by over-emphasis and repetition. A little less of everything would have gone a longer way. "Jawani-ka-Hawa," and Hindi talkies, are an important witness to the value of Hindi as a lingua franca for India. This notable production is a landmark in Indian film history. Three actors require special mention for their splendid performance. Devika Rani as the heroine, Mr. Najam-ul-Hussain as the hero and Mr. Kamta Prasad as the old gardener. And the reunion of Mr. Niranjan Pal and Mr. Himansu Rai who had not collaborated since their successful production of "The Light of Asia," is a happy omen. S.

STATE AND COMMERCE.

(CONTRIBUTED.)

The relationship between State and Commerce has undergone many changes in the course of history. At the beginning of what may be termed the modern commercial epoch the main duty of the State was to plan the course for private enterprise and act as an example. This did not mean that during this period of so-called "mercantilism" the State confined its activities to founding a few Government factories. Through the granting of privileges which sometimes amounted to monopolies, the private individual was encouraged to undertake enterprises of some magnitude and the whole policy had for its purpose the education of industrialists to positions of great responsibility. It was only when private business men were unwilling to take the risk of big schemes and could not be tempted to do so by special privileges, that the Government conducted the business itself. This excursion into the industrial sphere was, however, only faute de mieux and the undertaking in question was passed into the hands of private individuals. There are exceptions to this rule when enterprises begun by the Government have not subsequently passed into private hands, but such instances are exceptional. As private enterprise grew apace, the State withdrew more and more. With the exception of certain branches such as railways, posts and telegraphs, German industry before the War was largely self-governing. State influence was confined to the rectification of social ills through social legislature and supervision of the safety of buildings, machinery, etc.

After the War matters changed considerably. The Government began to put up its own factories not only where private initiative was lacking but in direct competition with privately-owned business. State undertakings were conducted on the same lines as their private prototypes and did not mark any new course or act in any way as an example. They had to recognize the same market standards as other industries but, if they could not compete naturally, a subsidy would be forthcoming which, of course, had to be paid by the taxpayer and the nation as a whole. The fact that the State factories could hold their own with private factories was not due to any superiority of administration. On the contrary, a State factory which is directed by a Government official cannot operate with the same efficiency as a private one because the director, be he ever such a model official, lacks the incentive of personal driving-power. Even the prospect of a share in profits cannot replace personal interest because the official, secure in the knowledge of his fixed salary, will not take any risks or responsibilities and no new methods are introduced. Even when purely Government enterprises are replaced by semi-private ones the result is the same.

In view of the unfavourable experience which Germany has had with Government enterprises it is easily comprehensible that the present economic policy is opposed to this form of State interference. Under the pressure of the crisis which private industry was powerless to overcome, the Government had to take steps to replace the lack of private initiative for the time being. This does not, however, amount to suppression but rather assistance over a stagnant patch. The public orders which were given were of an additional nature and thus in no way compete with existing industries. An attempt was made to arouse private initiative by means of housing repair allowances, tax rebates for the purchase of new machinery etc., but the task which the Government has undertaken to fulfil—that of leading the country out of the depression and guaranteeing the trade revival against relapses—is so gigantic that it would be impossible without some kind of definite State direction of commerce. Industry and agriculture and home trade and overseas trade have to be carefully balanced and private individuals must be prevented from influencing the home market to meet their own purposes. Today the State must direct private initiative in the interests of national economics. Conditions have changed since before the War when the Government could afford to keep apart from industrial matters. But State direction and supervision of trade in the interests of the community has nothing to do with an extension of its activities as such in the industrial sphere. The State has no wish to dispense with the advantages of private initiative but it must be steered in the course which national interests demand. The State only acts in a business capacity when no private individual can be found to undertake the risk and even then it is to remain a temporary measure for encouraging the producer and placing private industry in a position to carry on the work begun by the State. The only branches of industry which will continue to be conducted by the Government are public services such as railways, posts and telegraphs and gas and electricity supplies which are noted for their mechanical ways of operation.

THE CHILD MARRIAGE RESTRAINT (AMENDMENT) BILL, 1935.

The following is the text of the Child Marriage Restraint (Amendment) Bill, 1935, to amend the Child Marriage Restraint Act No. XIX of 1929, leave to introduce which in the Legislative Assembly has been accorded to Mr. B. Das, M. L. A., by the Governor-General in Council:—

Whereas it is expedient to amend the Child Marriage Restraint Act, 1929; it is hereby enacted as follows:—

1. This Act may be called the Child Marriage Restraint (Amendment) Act, 1935.

2. In Clause (c) of Section 2 of the Child Marriage Restraint Act, 1928, (hereinafter referred to as the said Act) between the words "is" and "thereby" the words "or is about to be" shall be inserted.

3. For Section 9 of the said Act, the following shall be substituted, namely:—9. (1) The Court may, if it is satisfied on information laid before it, through a complaint or otherwise, that an offence under this Act has been or is about to be committed, upon its own motion, issue process against any person suspected of having committed or of being about to commit such offence.

(2) No Court shall take cognizance of any offence under this Act after the expiry of one year from the date on which the offence is alleged to have been committed.

In Section 11 of the said Act—

(i) for sub-section (i) the following shall be substituted, namely:—

(i) When the Court takes cognizance of any offence under this Act upon a complaint made to it, it may, at any time after examining the complainant and before issuing process for compelling the attendance of the accused, require the complainant to execute a bond, with or without sureties, for a sum not exceeding one hundred rupees, as security for the payment of any compensation which the complainant may be directed to pay under Section 250 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, and if such security is not furnished within such reasonable time as the Court may fix, the complaint shall be dismissed.

Sub-section (ii) shall be omitted.

The following sections shall be added as Sections 12, 13 and 14 of the said Act, namely:—

12. (1) Notwithstanding anything to the contrary contained in this Act, the Court may, if satisfied from information laid before it through a complaint or otherwise that a child marriage in contravention of this Act has been arranged or is about to be solemnised, issue an injunction against any of the persons mentioned in Sections 3, 4, 5 and 6 of this Act prohibiting such marriage.

(2) Whoever, knowing that an injunction has been issued against him under Sub-section (1) of this section, disobeys such injunction shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three months or with a fine which may extend to one thousand rupees or with both.

13. Upon conviction under this Act and in addition to the penalties provided therein, the Court may require the husband of a female child (or if he be a minor, the person having charge of him in any capacity whatsoever) to furnish a bond, with or without sureties, for the separate living, custody and maintenance of the wife and for preventing the consummation of the marriage until she ceases to be a child, or until such later date as the Court may appoint.

14. A bond taken under Section 11 or Section 13 of his Act shall be deemed to be a bond taken under the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, and the provisions of Chapter XLII of that Code shall apply accordingly.

STATEMENT OF OBJECTS AND REASONS.

The object of this Bill is to amend the Act to which it refers (commonly known as the Sarda Act) by three provisions aimed at facilitating the more effective enforcement of the Act:—

First, by putting it beyond question that the Courts empowered to take proceedings under the Act may at their discretion issue an injunction prohibiting a marriage arranged in contravention of the Act.

Already Civil Courts in the Bombay Presidency are known in several cases to have issued injunction orders against marriages known to have been arranged in contravention of the Act. It is not known whether similar action has been taken in any other Province. But since doubts have been thrown upon the legality or practicability of this method, it seems desirable to remove such doubts by providing for it directly through the proposed amendment. The draft Bill proposes to impose a higher maximum penalty for the breach of such an injunction than the penalty provided in the Act in the case of prosecutions after the marriage has already taken place, on the ground that breach of a Court injunction involves contempt of court.

Secondly, by permitting the Court to take proceedings under the Act upon its own motion, without requiring the execution of a bond or taking security.

It is known that one of the principal impediments to enforcement of the Sarda Act at present lies in the obligation placed upon the complainant to incur the publicity of a formal complaint and, if required by the Court to execute a bond, to incur also the risk of losing the sum mentioned in the bond. The proposed amendment would enable the Court to proceed upon information obtained privately after taking such steps as it might think necessary to satisfy itself of the correctness of the information.

Thirdly, by enabling the Court to require the husband of a child-wife (or if he is a minor, his guardian) to make provision for the separate custody and maintenance of the child-wife and to refrain from consummating the marriage until she reaches the legal age for marriage, or until a later date if it thinks necessary.

A provision of this kind was recommended by the Age of Consent Committee (commonly called the Joshi Committee)—page 198, para 23. In default of such a provision, those who have the welfare of an illegally married child-wife at heart are often deterred from prosecuting the offenders by the knowledge that the prosecution, even if successful, will not rescue the child from the dangers of premature marital intercourse and may actually cause her to be maltreated by the husband or his family in revenge for the prosecution.

STERILISATION, THE "SUPREME CONTRACEPTIVE."

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

I am obliged to you for giving further publicity to my views on sterilisation. I have no desire to enter into a long controversy and so am sending you a cutting from the "Esquire," U. S. A., sent to me by Dr. Havelock Ellis which contains an article by him on the subject. This answers most of the points raised by you.

I am not an arm-chair critic but one who has long experience of birth control and sterilisation work. Day in and day out, workers like me have to listen to harrowing tales of the misery caused by couples being very prolific. Such persons demand a 100 per cent sure contraceptive and there is only one 100 per cent contraceptive now known and that is sterilisation. Even in India by the time the man has 4 or more live children, he has come to the age when he can gauge more or less accurately his future financial prospects.

The question of sterilisation of the woman was not mentioned because this is a rather serious operation while that of the man is very simple, not taking more than 15 or 20 minutes. I shall end this letter by quoting Havelock Ellis from another article: "But any one today who, realising Man's painful struggle to attain a due control of Nature, fails to regard sterilisation as the supreme contraceptive may fairly be regarded as an enemy of society. The only apology possible lies in the excuse brought forward in another connection by Dr. Johnson: 'Sheer ignorance.'"

BIHAR GOVERNMENT AND ARYA SAMAJIST MISSIONARIES.

Following are the replies to questions asked by Mr. Sachchidanand Sinha in the Bihar Legislative Council, on the alleged Government circular regarding Arya Samaj and Hindu Sabha activities in Chota Nagpur:—

Mr. Sachchidanand Sinha asked:—

(a) If the attention of the Government had been drawn to an alleged circular purporting to have been issued by Government on the above subject and published in the Searchlight of August 21, 1935. He further asked,

(b) Is the alleged circular genuine?

(c) If so, will Government be pleased to state whether it is intended to mark a departure from the observance of strict religious neutrality, as enjoined in the Proclamation of Queen Empress Victoria?

(d) If not, will Government be pleased to state the exact nature of "the activities" of Babu Jagatnarrain Lal and Arya Samajists in an anti-Christian campaign in Palamau and parts of Ranchi?

(e) Why are the Arya Samajist workers considered as "dangerous" by Government as stated in the said circular?

(f) Will Government be pleased to lay on the table extracts from the alleged objectionable and provocative speeches said to have been made by the said persons? If not, why not?

Mr. R. E. Russell replied:—

(a) The answer is in the affirmative.

(b) The circular is genuine.

(c) and (d) Government have no intention of departing from the observance of strict religious neutrality. They are compelled in the interests of the public peace to watch the activities of all religious missions where they are likely to arouse communal or racial feeling or are likely to come into conflict with other religious organizations. For this reason they keep under observation the activities of persons who have in the past shown a tendency to stir up communal or religious trouble.

The precise activities of Babu Jagatnarrain Lal and his associates which attracted the attention of the local Government are as follows:—realpatidar.com

(i) A missionary campaign was started in Palamau district by the Hindu Mahasabha through the agency of one Chandrika Prasad and others which concentrated principally upon the conversion to Hinduism of aborigines who had already become Christians.

(ii) Babu Jagatnaran Lal commenced propaganda in the press to arouse Hindu opinion against the work of Christian missionaries in Chota Nagpur. In an article published in the Indian Nation of the 8th July and in other papers he represented the animist aboriginal tribes in Chota Nagpur as Hindus and the work of the Christian missions as an inroad upon the Hindu religion and exhorted the Hindu public to rouse itself to action to counteract the effect of what he described as a "whirlwind campaign of Christianity."

(iii) He undertook tours in Palamau and Ranchi district accompanied by other workers with the object of rousing Hindu feeling on the subject.

In view of the fact that a number of Hindu Mahasabha and Arya Samaj workers had already entered the area, Government considered it necessary to supply the District Officers concerned with the names of persons who might, if they came into the area, be expected to create trouble. They accordingly sent to these officers the names of eight persons against whom Government had in the past been compelled to take action under the law for their repeated activities in fomenting communal feeling in Bihar. Government have not issued any instructions to their officers to take action against these persons; they have merely warned them that they are persons who have created trouble in the past.

(e) Because of their previous activities in stirring religious feeling by inflammatory speeches and writings.

(f) Government are not prepared to lay extracts from these speeches on the table. They are too numerous to be reproduced and are in many cases so grossly insulting to other religions, particularly Islam, that it is undesirable to give them publicity.

HINDU WIDOWS IN THE DECCAN*

(By G. V. KETKAR, B. A. LL. B., Poona.)

A very interesting judgment has been recently pronounced by the second class Sub-judge of Pandharpur in Sholapur District about the position of untensured Brahman widows in the Deccan. The case was launched in 1981. Judgment was pronounced early this year, i. e., after four years.

The wicked and unseemly custom of tonsuring widows is prevalent only amongst the Deccani Brahmans. As a consequence of that custom, untensured widows came to be regarded as unfit to perform certain religious ceremonies and functions. Food cooked by an untensured widow is not to be used to feed Brahmans on the occasion of religious festivities. Food cooked by her cannot be offered to a Sanyasi.

Fortunately the custom of tonsuring widows is gradually being abandoned in educated families. Pradnyaneshwar Yati—an educated and cultured Mahratta Sanyasi—took up the question of the disabilities of this growing class of the untensured widows. Although a Sanyasi he saw no objection to be served food by these widows. He found that this objection has no foundation in Hindu scriptures. He openly challenged orthodox people to prove from the Shastras that he was wrong.

But orthodoxy securely entrenched in the bulwork of powerful custom generally overlooks such challenges. The Sanyasi however put them on their defence in another direction. He found that the untensured Brahmin widows are not allowed to touch the feet of the well-known "Vithoba" idol at Pandharpur shrine. In this temple all touchable Hindus men, women and children have been allowed to touch the feet of the idol with their forehead. Only the untensured Brahmin widows were denied that right!

Mrs. Parvatibai Datar, an untensured Brahman widow acting on the advice of the Sanyasi, served a registered notice on the 'Badvas' or managers of the Pandharpur temple declaring her intention to visit the temple and take the Darshan in the customary way of placing her head on the feet of the idol. In their answer to this notice the managers of the temple denied her the right of taking Darshan in the customary way, as she was an untensured Brahmin widow. Based on this denial as the cause of action, the civil suit was filed, for a declaration of this right and the consequential relief of an injunction to restrain the managers from preventing her in the exercise of that right. Although the matter in issue was comparatively of minor importance, the case was strenuously fought out and all the scriptural texts about tonsure of widows were minutely scrutinized and discussed both by the advocates on each side and by the judge in his extensive and exhaustive judgment. The right of an untensured Brahman widow to place her head on the feet of the Pandharpur idol was established and an injunction has been granted against the managers of the temple not to obstruct the exercise of that right.

The discussion of Dharmashastra texts in this judgment is useful to all students of Hindu Law and particularly the progressive school of thought amongst the Hindus. For it has been clearly demonstrated that the most ancient and authoritative texts, the Vedas and the principal smritis, do not contain any reference to tonsure of Brahman widows. On the other hand, it was found that the ancient writers of Smritis were against the tonsure of women in any case. Even where tonsure is prescribed as a prayaschitta or penance for a major sin, it was not operative in the case of women. For, it is specifically laid down that in the case of all women in lieu of tonsure only cutting a lock of hair two inches in length at the end has been prescribed as prayaschitta. This shows that to the older Smritis writers the idea of tonsure of women in any case was repugnant. It was in the later commentaries on the Smritis and some recent interpolations in Puranas that we find the first traces of this hideous custom of tonsure.

After the custom of tonsuring became prevalent the older texts which were expressly against tonsure of women in any case, came to be explained by restricting them to married women only.

This case demonstrates how some undesirable practices in Hinduism were introduced by Puranas and commentators and how in some cases older authoritative texts expressly contradictory to these undesirable practices were twisted to suit the latter. This is one of the many instances in which a reform in Hinduism means going back to the original catholicity and rejecting the later narrowing tendencies.

figure who has been universally acknowledged as the 'Father of Modern India.' The various papers read and addresses delivered on the occasion of the Centenary Celebration in 1933 are being gathered into the Volume which will contain, among other things, complete reports of the celebration held all over India and abroad,—indeed, a unique record of a world-wide homage. A comprehensive and exhaustive study from all points of view of the "Inaugurator of the Modern Age in India," this book of about 800 pages of Royal octavo size, neatly printed, profusely illustrated, and strongly bound in full cloth, will contain Studies and Addresses by eminent Indians and others. The book, which will be published about the middle of the next month, will be priced at Rs. 5, but Members of the General Committee of the Centenary Celebrations will get it at the Concession rate of Rs. 4 a copy; while those booking their orders with cash in advance will get copies at the reduced rates of Rs. 4 and Rs. 3-8 respectively. Orders and prices to be sent to the Ram Mohan Centenary Office, 210-6, Cornwallis Street, Calcutta.

LORD PASSFIELD'S IMPRESSIONS OF SOVIET RUSSIA.

Lord Passfield, speaking in mail week at the Fabian summer school at Rowledge, near Farnham, Surrey, said that the new system in Russia was much bigger than an industrial success or a social change. We were witnessing the emergence of a new civilisation, as different from western civilisation as that was from Islam and Buddhism. It was certainly the biggest thing that had happened in Europe since the Renaissance.

Referring to the elimination of profit-making he said: "If I were to say to a Russian child, 'If I buy a dozen herrings at a penny each and sell them at three halfpence each, how much should I get?' the answer would be, 'Six months imprisonment.'"

The U. S. S. R. was the most exciting place in the world to go to—not even excluding Abyssinia,—because there were new categories about everything. 'For instance, when I was on my way to the school I saw on Haslemere station,' he said, 'a man publicly kissed his wife when they met. If you did that in the U. S. S. R. and the train conductor saw you he would summarily fine you two roubles.'

The Bolshevik rule was described by Lord Passfield as 'a most extraordinary success.' When he went to Russia in 1932 there were no shops in Leningrad or Moscow except bread shops, and his wife had to take with her odds and ends such as hooks and eyes. On his visit last autumn the Leningrad Co-operative Society had 980,000 members, a large store, and 400 branch stores in which one could buy every conceivable thing. Every class of goods which Russia used to import was now being made there, and if the Far Eastern army were cut off it would be able to live there a whole year on what was made on the spot and supply itself with munitions.

Russian industry was shockingly inefficient, but it was turning out the goods. The country was relatively prosperous, and there had been no unemployment for the last five years. There had been a great change in the attitude of this country to Russia lately. Even bankers had been impressed because Russia had begun to pay her debts in gold which she was producing.

The average Russian workman was getting a livelihood and standard of comfort, education, and treatment in sickness much better than that of the two million English workmen who were on the dole. The Russian working-class families and a large proportion of the collective farm peasant were better off than the lowest grade of our population. People born since the revolution had grown up with no sense of sin and largely without a sense of the super-natural. The churches are there and are open, but we found some trouble in going because we could not find out which was Sunday.'

THE JEWS IN GERMANY.

Herr Hitler addressed the Reichstag on September 15, at Nuremberg. He concluded with a reference to the Jews. He said the Jewish anti-German boycott had restarted and the German Jews were again active. He gave warning that if such actions were not ended further laws would have to be issued to settle things. "Government will try to create a basis to enable Germans to find a tolerable relationship with the Jews. If this hope is frustrated and the agitation continues the situation must be re-examined."

After Herr Hitler's speech General Goering read the new laws.

The first law says the colours of the Reich are black, white and red. The Reich, the National and the commercial flag is the Swastika flag. The Chancellor shall determine the future war and the Reich services flag for the use of the army, navy etc.

The second law says a citizen of the Reich can only be a state citizen of German or kindred blood who by his behaviour has shown that he is willing and suitable to serve the German people and the Reich loyally. The Reich citizenship shall be acquired by the bestowal of a letter of patent. The Reich citizen is the sole bearer of full political rights.

By the first article of the third law the marriages of Jews with citizens of the nation of German or kindred blood are forbidden. Marriages solemnized despite this decree will be invalid even if solemnized abroad for the purpose of circumventing the law. By article two sexual intercourse outside the marriage covenant between Jews and Germans or people of kindred blood is forbidden. By article three Jews are forbidden to employ female Germans or kindred blood in their homes. By article four Jews are forbidden to hoist the National Flag or display the national colours, but may display Jewish colours. The penalties for violating the law are penal servitude or prison for the first two articles which are enforced immediately and imprisonment for a year under article three which comes into force from January 1.

CASE AGAINST "ASHRAM" IN DELHI.

Kanwar Singh and 4 others connected with a so-called Ashram in Kucha Bulaqi Begum, Dariba, were hauled before Mr. A. Isar, City Magistrate, on Monday, the 9th, on charges of abduction of a woman, but the court due to pressure of work transferred the case to the court of Mr. Benjamin, Magistrate, 1st Class, writes The Hindustan Times. The facts of the case as alleged by the prosecution are: A woman from a Rohtak village came to Delhi to see a girl from her village. An agent of the Ashram met her and offered his services to take her to the place of her friend, but instead, he took her to the so-called Ashram in Kucha Bulaqi Begum, where she was kept against her will. She was anxious to get out of the clutches of the accused, but she felt helpless. She daily experienced revolting scenes in this "Den of Infamy" and ultimately managed to escape one day and made a detailed report to the Kotwali police. She has made sensational allegations against the "Ashram Organisers." Sub-Inspector Badri Alam raided the "Ashram" and rescued 36 helpless women, who were detained by the accused. They were all examined and sent to their respective homes. The Ashram was disbanded by the police and the 5 accused were arrested. Accused will now stand trial before Mr Benjamin.

SEQUEL TO MR. STOKES' CONVERSION.

A deputation consisting of leaders of the Hindu Mahasabha, Sanatan Dharma and Arya Samaj went recently to Bushire State, Simla Hills, in connection with the differences which had arisen in the State over the conversion of Mr. Satyananda Stokes to Hinduism. The deputation was led by Bhai Parmanand and consisted of Swami Anand Giri, Yogi Jagnananand, Metha Gopal Das, Swami Pranwanand, Mr. Vidyadhar, Babu Manohar Das and Lala Gadu Ram.

The deputation was given a very cordial welcome by the State authorities and the members were treated as guest of the State. Bushire being the premier State in these Hills the deputation felt that a proper lead by the State in the matter would be of very great assistance to the cause they represented.

Bhai Parmanand informs the Press that the Ruler gave them a very sympathetic hearing and assured them that he and his predecessors had always allowed conversions to Hinduism, and while pointing out that he could not force his subjects to take any particular view on the matter, he assured them that he would issue orders so that those who promoted the conversion of Satyanand Stokes may not be boycotted or persecuted.

The Ruler also issued orders that there should be no party spirit in the State on the subject and has communicated the orders to the local officials of the State. Bhai Parmanand says that the deputation having achieved its purpose thanked the Ruler and returned to Simla.

Labour Party Dissensions:—The front rank of the Labour Party has been shaken by disagreement on the Abyssinian issue. Following Mr. Lansbury's statement of disagreement with the official policy, especially regarding sanctions, Lord Ponsonby today resigned the leadership of the party in the House of Lords. Lord Ponsonby declares that serious differences with the party on important points in Britain's foreign policy and its decision in the present international crisis prevent him continuing his leadership.

NOTES

The Penal Code and the Press Act:—Referring to Mr. Satyamurthi's objection that there was no need to re enact the Emergency Press Law as the ordinary law was sufficient to punish the offences to which it relates, the Home Member spoke of dummy editors and the inability of the ordinary law to catch the real offenders. But the Press law is availed of in preference to the ordinary law even where there is no question about the identity of the writers. The District Judge of Guntur in the Madras Presidency delivered judgment last week in a case against three members of the local Labour Protection League for publishing and distributing pamphlets exhorting labourers to fight for their rights. The Judge admitted that the detailed objects as defined in the pamphlets were perfectly reasonable—at least not at all illegal. He further observed: "There is nothing in the pamphlets inculcating violent action or unconstitutional methods, nor is there any evidence that the pamphlets have tended to lead to a breach of the peace. In fact the Special Branch Sub-Inspector, has definitely stated that on 29th June, 1935, the pamphlets were distributed outside the factory of Mr. Maddi Venkata Subbayya and although there were 60 or 70 coolies present, there was no disturbance whatever." For these and other reasons the Advocate for the defence objected to the invocation of the Press Act. Judge D. N. Strathie suggested that the prosecution was probably deterred from using Section 163 of the Indian Penal Code, which deals with the same offence, namely, creating feelings of hatred and contempt against a class, because Chief Justice Beaumont in Maniben Kara's case had insisted that it was necessary for the attack being on "a definite and ascertainable class of His Majesty's subjects" in order to come within the purview of the Penal Code Section. Judge Strathie said that this interpretation was not followed by the Madras High Court. In any case, he did not consider that it was his province to enter into this aspect of the question. He held that "the rich" constituted a "class" within the meaning of the Press Act, whether or not in that of the Penal Code and convicted the accused and sentenced them to six months' imprisonment.

A Striking Contrast:—The old practice of judges inflicting prior to passing sentence long lectures on accused on the enormity of their delinquency, has happily become obsolete as a consequence largely of the growth of the social conscience and a deeper understanding of the springs of human conduct. Any sort of harangue to accused from the Bench would grate on educated people. Judge Strathie seems to have felt likewise. But he also felt that he owed a duty to the accused as a man to fellowmen who were not actuated by selfish or sordid motives in bringing themselves within the pale of the Press Act. He presented them with two books, Joad's "Liberty Today" and a volume of Galsworthy's plays which, he thought, dealt with public wrongs in a manner which would not expose writers to prosecution under the Press Act or the Penal Code, and which he commended to the careful perusal of the accused during their enforced leisure in prison. There is no mistaking the sincerity and kindly feeling which inspired Mr. Strathie to make his presentation and the observations which accompanied it, after performing his official duty. Years ago a distinguished Governor who held and acted on the principle that the promotion of the feeling of fellow-citizenship between Englishmen and Indians was of greater importance than administrative punctilios, confided to this writer that he had not the least difficulty with the younger civilians in giving effect to his idea, but that he found the older men extremely difficult to bring round. The contrast between Sir Henry Craik's speech on the Criminal Law Amendment Bill, which is the subject of our leading article, and Mr. Strathie's exhortation to the three accused in the Guntur case, is striking as an illustration of the observation of the broadminded Governor. We should add that His Excellency rather underrated the importance of constitutional reform as a means of promoting fellow-feeling among Indians and Englishmen which he strove earnestly to bring about.

The Rich and their Workers :—We publish on another page Judge Strathie's lecture to the three members of the Guntur Labour Protection League. As it was delivered after the sentence was pronounced and the judge had ceased to be a judicial person, comment on it may not amount to Contempt of Court, an offence of almost indefinite extension nowadays in this country. Mr. D. N. Strathie asked the accused, "Do you seriously think that you could run Maddi Venkatasubbayya's tobacco factory if, through a rising of the workers, you did get control over it?" Does Mr. Strathie seriously believe that Maddi Subbayya could run his factory if the labourers left it? Surely, the health and moral and material condition of the workers is at least as great a public interest as the production of bidis or cheroots. "What do you know about tobacco, its buying, grading and marketing?" is another shrewd thrust of Mr. Strathie's at the men whom a few minutes previously he had sentenced to serve six months in jail, poring over two books which he kindly presented to them for the purpose. We doubt if these books convey the lessons which Mr. Strathie so earnestly preached to the three gentlemen of the Guntur Labour Protection League. Galsworthy, certainly, and Joad, probably, would insist that a knowledge of how to work a tobacco factory least deleteriously to workers was at least as important in tobacco factory owners as knowledge of the grading of tobacco. We are not so sure as Mr. Strathie that Galsworthy's plays or Joad's book can not be brought under the Press law just the same as the plays of the Guntur Labourites. Galsworthy's "Escape," for instance, may be indicted as creating sympathy for escaped prisoners and thus bringing law and order into contempt. Mr. Strathie himself seems to have thought that the introduction in one of the Guntur plays of a Magistrate who took bribes, was tantamount to imputation of corruption to Government, bringing it into contempt. We know of nothing so damnably against the rich as a passage which occurs in an old book as spoken by a man who lived some nineteen centuries ago. It is a widely read book, too. In this book it is written: "Then said Jesus unto his disciples, 'Verily I say unto you, That a rich man shall hardly enter into the kingdom of heaven. And again I say unto you, it is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God.'" The Guntur authorities do not seem to have come across this rather famous book.

Electoral Differences :—The recommendations of the Delimitation Committee of Madras for the seats allotted to Indian Christians and the "scheduled castes" hitherto known as the depressed classes, have given rise to acute controversy. Differing from the Bombay Delimitation Committee, which has allotted the three communal seats reserved for Indian Christians to selected districts where the Christian population is largest, leaving them in other districts to form part of the general constituencies; the Madras Committee has, it would seem, divided the whole Presidency into nine electorates, that being the number of seats reserved for Indian Christians in the schedule to the Government of India Bill. Mr. Appadurai who was a member of the Madras Delimitation Committee, writing in the Guardian, maintains that the assignment of the allotted seats to selected districts is contrary to the plain wording of the Bill which lays down that "a Province, exclusive of any portion thereof which His Majesty in Council may deem unsuitable for inclusion in any constituency of any particular class, shall be divided into territorial constituencies." The Bombay Delimitation Committee does not seem to have considered this point. It has proceeded on the assumption that the Bill assigned a certain number of seats to Indian Christians and the Committee was free to distribute them in the manner it deemed best...In respect of election to the seats assigned to the scheduled castes also, there is a sharp difference between the Madras and Bombay recommendations. The single non-transferrable vote in plural constituencies has been recommended for election to these seats in Madras. The Bombay Committee, on the other hand, has recommended cumulative voting, which has been in vogue in Municipal elections and is well understood by the public. The Committee in support of this method observes: "Where there are several minorities such as Jains, Indian Christians, Jews, Parsis who are unprotected i. e. for whom no seats are reserved, the only way in which they can get a chance of securing the election of a candidate of their choice is to provided plural constituencies with the right of cumulative voting. This system is necessary even for the Marathas and scheduled castes in constituencies in which no seats are reserved for them." Even where seats are reserved, cumulative voting will enable the voters to return the member they want from among candidates of the scheduled castes. The leaders of these castes in Madras feel that the plan of the single transferrable vote is against the principle of the Poona Pact which is incorporated in the Communal Award and in the scheme of the Government of India Bill, and disadvantageous to the scheduled castes.

Excessive European Representation :—In reviewing the Bombay Delimitation Committee's Report, (August 17), we called attention to the excessive representation in the Bombay Legislative Council recommended for Europeans, first, as members of a community, secondly, as the Chamber of Commerce and, again, as the Trades Association, besides having the right to compete in all special constituencies. Mr. L. R. Tairsee who represents the Indian Commercial community in the Bombay Legislative Council stated that the Bombay Trades Association consisted of only 36 members. It consisted of tailors and outfitters, hair-dressers, provision dealers, watch-makers, cigarette sellers, caterers, ice cream sellers and others who have been passed off as European firms but which are predominantly Indian firms. Many firms have one partner, a European, while other partners are Indians. Messrs Cornaglia, added Mr. Tairsee, is now an Indian firm. So, concluded the Indian Commercial representative, though these firms are really not European firms, they are supposed to be European firms for the purpose of membership. Mr. Tairsee did not say how many of the Europeans in the Trades Association were British subjects. Apparently there is some convention that the Trades Association should send only a European to represent it in the Legislature. The Bombay Delimitation Committee has slurred over this important question of the competence of the Trades Association to be constituted a special electorate. Government, too, seem to have been quite unaware of the small and unrepresentative character of the body. Mr. Tairsee's protest that Indian Commerce was given unfairly small representation as compared with European Commerce, is unanswerable. But we doubt if the Local Government can prevail against vested interests and transfer the seat at least of the Trades Association to Indian merchants.

The Rise of the Bakats :—The current Harijan describes how the Bakats of Kani near Ankola in North Kanara, who were treated as untouchables forty years ago and were recorded as such in the Kanara Gazetteer of 1883, have come to be treated and recognised as caste Hindus. "Many persons," writes Mr. Dinkar Desai who communicates the information, "are even ignorant of the fact that they (the Bakats) were once untouchables." He says that the strongest reason for this imperceptible change in the social status of the Bakats is to be found in the fact that they, especially their women, were employed as domestic servants by the Gaud Saraswat Brahmins of Ankola, and that by close contact with them Bakats gave up their dirty habits and imitated their employers to such an extent that the Bakat women of today are considered higher than those of other agricultural communities of the Taluka. This process is not new. It has gone on in Hindu society for centuries. It is the natural and accepted process of castes rising in the social scale. Other instances may be cited of the operation of this process. The Gaud Saraswats of Ankola were not social reformers and they did not employ the Bakats with the object of raising them out of the slough of untouchability. The first moral to be drawn from this interesting development, is that the reformer should strive to stimulate the ameliorative forces inherent in every society rather than to plant himself in their place. The second is, the social status of a community or caste is largely determined by the opportunities open to its women to live a clean, cultured and self-respecting life.

Ban on Arya Samajists :—In the Reformer of August 31, we commented on a circular letter sent by the Chief Secretary to the Bihar Government to Commissioners of Divisions warning them against certain Arya Samaj preachers who were carrying on an "anti-Christian campaign" in Palamau and certain parts of Ranchi. Mr. Sachchidananda Sinha asked a series of questions about this circular in the Bihar Legislative Council. We reprinted in the last issue the questions and the answer thereto. The Chief Secretary admitted issuing the circular and justified it on the extraordinary ground that the people in the areas mentioned had already been converted to Christianity! It is, according to this view, wrong to seek to convert people who had been already converted to Christianity to another religion, while Christian Missions have been for years and are now free to convert people born and brought up in other religions for generations to one or other of the numerous sects of their faith. Further comment on this episode, however, is happily unnecessary as satisfactory assurances seem to have been given to a deputation which waited on the Bihar Government.

"Settlement of Accounts" :—When Signor Mussolini referred to the right of Italians to demand a "settlement of accounts with Abyssinia," all non-Italians believed this was a reference to the defeat suffered by Italian forces forty years ago at Adowa. "Italian Community in India", however, explains the words in an original manner. The passage is significant coming as it does at a time when most Italians have given up all talk of right in connection with the Abyssinian campaign. "Abyssinian hostility," writes the Italian communalist, "might be said to be historical and to have begun from the days when the Italians as did the other nations of Europe set out to search for new fields of activity in the Black Continent." After narrating at length the refusal of various Ethiopian Emperors to conclude treaties with the "laborious" Italians, the pamphleteer proceeds, "Not a single concession has been granted to Italians in Abyssinia." Again, the sad tale of loans refused by Abyssinia brings us to the rule of Haile Salassie from whom better treatment was expected but not received. And finally, comes the indictment. "Italy cannot permit that she should be refused the right to construct the Assab-Dessie road when the English have been allowed to build the road from Gambela to Gore, and the French that from Dikkil to Dessie; nor can she admit that land concessions should be refused to her and granted to the English on the Bir-Bir, while the tobacco monopoly is given to the French and the alcohol monopoly to the Belgians. There is no reason why just satisfaction of an economic order, which would also benefit the progress of Abyssinia herself should be denied to Italy."

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Sept. 28]

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

BOMBAY, September 28, 1935.

THE CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

In winding up the debate in the Legislative Assembly on the Bill to prolong the existence of certain penal legislation, adopted three years ago as an emergency measure, which is due shortly to lapse, the Home Member, Sir Henry Craik, made the noteworthy admission that the measures had so far failed of their object. "My information definitely is," he said, "that terrorism, although there has been some slight diminution in Bengal, is by no means dead. Within the last five months we have had, I think, 25 terrorist incidents... In the face of that, it is idle to assert that terrorism is a mere bugbear, and that as a movement it is dead." It is, perhaps, characteristic of the bureaucratic mind that the conclusion which it draws from this fact, is quite the reverse of what every person who considers it with an open mind would draw from it. If terrorism, that is, the belief that what are felt as wrongs can be righted by killing or maiming the agents of the system which is regarded as the conscious originator of the wrongs, is regarded as a disease of the body politic, and these punitive laws as the cure for it, the treatment, on the admission of the Home Member, has failed. So long as the measures are in force, there is an apparent lull but this is merely on the surface. The forces of terrorism are seething underground and the moment repression is relaxed, they manifest themselves with unabated ferocity. The Home Member devoted a large part of his speech to the Press laws. This is what he said: "The experience of the three periods within which Press legislation was suspended has shown conclusively that directly that legislation is suspended the deterioration in the tone of certain sections of the Press is serious and immediate." Your treatment does not eliminate the poison in the body politic. Does it even keep it effectively controlled during the period it is applied? Referring to a criticism that the pamphlet of 25 pages containing samples of seditious writings supplied to the members of the Assembly, was insufficient to justify the proposal to give a fresh lease of life to the emergency Press laws, the Home Member exclaimed: "Here is my mass of material, 429 foolscap pages of extracts of seditious or inflammatory or communal writings in the press. Any honourable member who cares to wade through this mass of sedition, incitement to murder, obscenity and vulgarity (italics are ours) is welcome to do so." It is not clear whether this mass consisted of writings in the intervals when the laws were in abeyance or includes also those produced while they were in force. In either case our argument holds that the measures at the best are but temporary palliatives, whilst it is possible that by suppressing symptoms they help the growth and spread of the poison within. The irony of the Home Member's belief that by renewing the Act he is helping the incoming reformed Government of India, which is widely proclaimed to be a large step to self-government is not, of course, obvious to him. He is really making the inauguration of the Reforms, such as they are, as malodorous as possible to the Indian public. We would stress this point as we see that Sir Henry Craik is not the only member of Government who has used this argument as a self-evident one. Sir Zaffrullah Khan used it to oppose the manufacture of locomotives in India. The Viceroy himself urged it as an apology for certifying this Bill on which the Legislative Assembly has refused to place its imprimatur. By the way, do we want an emergency law to deal with obscenity and vulgarity?

The Home Member tried to clinch his point about the existence of terrorism in the country by referring to the speech made by Mr. Krishnakant Malaviya on the Bill. "If anything said in this debate has been a strong argument in favour of this Bill that speech was," he said, "because even now, when this legislation is in force, the Home Member comes forward in open praise of murderers." The legislation referred to is for the control of the Press and not for the control of speaking in the Legislature. If the Home Member were free to do it, he would evidently bring speeches in the Legislature under the same kind of executive control as has been done with the Press. We may yet have a law requiring that the speeches of non-official members should be revised by the Home Department before they are delivered. We have not read Mr. Krishnakant Malaviya's speech and can not say if it was, as the Home Member said it was, "open praise of murderers," or, as the Leader of the Opposition, Mr. Bhulabhai Desai, seems to have understood it, a condemnation of a system which drove young men and women into crime in the misguided belief that there was no other way of changing it. Sir Henry Craik admitted that Mr. Desai was perfectly entitled to think of these people as brave and misguided youths. Did Mr. Malaviya say anything different? That some concession to motives is not irrelevant in dealing with this sort of crime, is suggested by Mr. Winston Churchill with reference to the Irish rebels with whom the British Government concluded the treaty which became the basis of the Irish Free State constitution. "It was only possible to say of those responsible for these acts," he writes, "that they were not actuated by selfish or sordid motives; that they were ready to lay down their own lives; and that in the main they were supported by the sentiment of their fellow-countrymen." (The World Crisis, Vol. V, page 296). Sir Henry Craik told the Assembly that he looked on the Indian terrorists as "mad dogs, as dangerous animals." But whichever view is the right view, whether the terrorists are misguided patriots or mad dogs, the fact remains that the measures of Government, on the Home

Member's own admission, have failed to eliminate them; and if history proves one thing more than another, it is that, while repression is useful as a temporary expedient, it is futile as a permanent cure for political discontents. Repression can not be more systematically and comprehensively applied than it was in Tsarist Russia or in Abdul Hamid's Turkey.

Sir Henry Craik described himself as more or less the centre of the intelligence system of the Government of India, "which is extraordinarily wide, extremely prompt and is, in my opinion, very shrewdly drawn up." Sir Henry allowed that possibly other honourable members would not agree with his estimate. Possibly, too, the latter are in a better position to judge than the Home Member. The Right Honourable Srinivasa Sastry, speaking at the unveiling of a bust of Sir William Wedderburn in Madras last week, said that at one time he was shadowed by the Intelligence Department men. Gokhale had the same experience. It is the general opinion that the activities of the Department, on which Sir Henry Craik depends for his knowledge of Indian affairs, are more vexatious to public men who make no secret of their opinions and activities than to terrorists whose methods are necessarily underground. However that may be, Sir Henry Craik's organisation can not claim greater perfection or a wider range than the Tsar's or the Turkish Sultan's. Representative institutions are the channels by which a constitutional government derives information of the course of national affairs. When the Intelligence Department is preferred for this purpose, it is high time that the guardians of the State took measures to arrest the blight at the core of which it is a sure symptom. Sir Henry Craik came to Sinia with a great reputation as a just and impartial administrator in difficult Punjab. The qualities most needed in the Government of India, however, are insight, imagination, capacity to understand other points of view than one's own. These go to make the constructive statesman.

The Time Factor :—"All the things on which life depends must take their time to sprout and grow and ripen. Children and trees and corn and beasts. It is not much use trying to increase their pace there. You can do that with factory products. And they can be dispensed with, nearly all of them. I am not saying anything about folks being unwilling to do without a lot of them, I should not want them to do that either. But if we were forced to do without them. That which takes its time to come to maturity, that is the indispensable. Pace and records and that kind of thing, all I say is that it's amusing. But if all the wheels that hum and buzz and race about the earth came to a standstill, we could still carry on. But if the seasons stopped their usual course, that would be the end." Ida Elisabeth, by Sigrid Undset.

THE MEMEL QUESTION.

In his broadcast address to the Reichstag on September 15th., Herr Hitler profited by European excitement on the Italo-Abyssinian dispute to reiterate Nazi opposition to Lithuania. On May 21 this year, the German Chancellor had declared German willingness to negotiate non-aggression pacts with all neighbour states except Lithuania, "not that we want war there but because we cannot enter into political treaties with a state which disregards the most primitive laws of human society." This warning that Germany is still sore on the Memel issue, was followed up in the recent Reichstag address with an appeal to the League to intervene. "Peaceful Memel has been robbed by Lithuania," said the Chancellor amid 'wild cheers'; "the people of Memel have been oppressed for years. Germany must devote her attention to this. Representations from foreign powers have been fruitless. Memel citizens have been treated worse than criminals. Every appeal to Lithuanian Government is vain and the preparations for the coming elections are a mockery." In view of the fact that this aggressive reference to Lithuania stung three European centres to action—Paris repeated with added anxiety her inquiry whether Britain would apply sanctions against Germany; London felt impelled to obtain an assurance from the Lithuanian Government that the Memel elections will be held in accordance with the provisions of the Statute of 1924; and at Geneva the Lithuanian delegates to the League of Nations protested against Herr Hitler's declaration as likely to disturb friendly relations—Memel, one might safely assume, will play a large part in European politics in the near future.

Memel Territory, comprising the city of that name and its environs—an area of 945 square miles, was separated from East Prussia in 1919 by the Allies with a view to providing Lithuania with a port on the Baltic. As there was no intention of handing over its administration to Lithuania, the Memel unit was run by a few French soldiers. The Lithuanian Government, apparently regarding this measure as inspired by financial considerations, entered on a boycott of this port and raised customs barriers between herself and the territory. In 1920 the Poles seized Vilna, the Lithuanian national capital, and dug themselves in so well that they were recognised by all the Great Powers, except Soviet Russia, as the owners. The Lithuanians 'compensated' themselves for the loss of Vilna—her treaties with Russia still insist that Vilna is Lithuanian—by driving out the French soldiers and occupying Memel, in January 1923. Her act of violence was crowned by the recognition of the Conference of Ambassadors in February and after prolonged negotiations the Statute of Memel guaranteeing governmental, economic and cultural autonomy to Memel Territory was signed by the Allies and Lithuania in May 1924. The Government consists of a Governor appointed by Lithuania; a cabinet of five in which the President is chosen by the Governor and then selects his four colleagues; and a legislature of twenty-nine members elected by universal suffrage. Memel-land sent six deputies to the Lithuanian Chamber till 1926 when a Fascist Government took over the administration and dissolved Parliament. A dictatorship has ruled ever since and though Fascist, it has been compelled by German-Polish politics to form a close alliance with Soviet Russia. Lithuania's sovereignty was confirmed over Memel Territory by a decision of the Hague Court in 1932 conceding powers of dismissal to the Governor of Memel over the President and his cabinet. Herr Hitler's rise to power in Germany intensified the conflict between Germans and Lithuanians in Memel, and the constitutional government established by the guarantors of the Statute of 1924 has weakened its powers of resistance to the two dictatorships which oppress it on either side. The triennial elections which are due on September 29th, have raised a storm of agitation in Germany and Lithuania, and both countries are working to obtain a favourable verdict—unfortunately for the Memel-lander.

German feeling on the Memel question has always been strong. But all objections were overruled by the Allies on the ground that, out of a population of 150,000, only 25,000 were Germans; that Germans preponderate in the city but Lithuanians in the hinterland; that the minority was to be protected in the use of their language and their schools; and that their religion was to be safeguarded. That Germany was not satisfied is evident from Dr. Schacht's protest ("The End of Reparations") "that the overwhelmingly German territory of Memel was allowed, against its will, to fall completely under Lithuanian domination. Consider what it means when parts of the highly civilised and cultivated German people fall under the domination of a little branch of the human race which, however much one may respect it, clearly stands behind in culture and civilisation." The weakness of the League formula is shown up by the fact that the economic guarantee, that all states whose commerce must pass through the Territory should be assured of access to the port of Memel, is ineffective in the case of Poland against whom Lithuania has closed the River Niemen and Memel Port; that culturally Lithuania has discouraged the study of German; and that constitutionally Lithuanian dictatorship has prevailed over the autonomy guaranteed by the League. The German claim, on the other hand, that Memel-landers would prefer to be under the more cultured government of Germany is considerably weakened by the fact that the ordinary citizen is more concerned about freedom to go about his own business than with the reputation his Government enjoys for culture. This freedom he is more likely to enjoy even under Fascist Lithuania than in Nazi Germany for two reasons. Germany is now outside the League and free from the influence of international opinion, however weakly organised it may be. Lithuania is a member and very anxious to remain one. (The extent of the League's ability to enforce its decision in the dispute between Italy and Abyssinia will no doubt influence the Memel elections. Germany is awaiting the result. The breakdown of the League of Nations will necessitate alliances between European nations, and Lithuania would be glad to obtain German support against Poland even at the cost of Memel Territory.) Secondly, as a small state Lithuania can ill afford to antagonise world opinion, particularly with the powerful and unfriendly Poland as her neighbour. The coming elections, therefore, ought to be a clear verdict for Lithuania, even if she does not attempt to manipulate the votes as Germany fears she will. A factor that will probably go far to counteract the overwhelming Lithuanian majority in the Memel Territory, is the indebtedness of the peasants to Germans in the city. But apart from the elections, Herr Hitler's statement following so rapidly on the reception of the Italian ambassador in Berlin, adds to the anxieties of the Memel problem, hinting as it does at a squaring of Italian objections to German ambitions in that direction. Even if the Italians are averse to supporting Herr Hitler actively, it is difficult to see how German aggression on Lithuania can be checked with Mussolini's attention engaged in an Abyssinian campaign. Britain, it is believed, favours German claims to Memel and so does Japan. Soviet Russia has not accepted Memel as Lithuanian territory in any of her treaties with Lithuania. Can France alone stop Germany?

STERILISATION IN INDIA—A SOCIAL PROBLEM.

In a feverish craze for social purity the Hitlerites in Germany have made themselves the object of an almost scandalous sensation. The dust of criticism which they have kicked up in this way has obscured some of the best points in their own policy and programme. The sterilisation decrees which have been recently issued in Germany are one of the blessings of Hitler's dictatorship and deserve a careful study in all other civilised countries. India in her peculiar social and economic conditions has an important lesson to learn from the experiments which Germany and other countries have made with human sterilisation.

The Eugenic Law promulgated in Germany in January 1934 has made elaborate provisions for the formation of local Eugenic Boards with full powers to investigate individual cases of mental deficiency and to issue a compulsory order for sterilisation if necessary. Nineteen States in America have passed sterilisation laws most of which legalise sterilisation of persons suffering from mental disorders. California has become a centre of magnificent researches in mental therapy and has developed an atmosphere in which the defectives think it to be an honourable thing to seek sterilisation. In England Eugenic sterilisation is still an offence against the law; the movement, however, has lately received a great impetus owing to the publication of a report of a Departmental Committee of the Ministry of Health (i. e. the Brook Report). The Committee unanimously recommends that voluntary sterilisation of persons who are likely to transmit a grave physical or mental disability should be legalised. The movement has also reached other European countries which have already passed the necessary legislation.

Eugenic sterilisation has so far been limited only to cases of mental deficiency. There is an almost universal consensus of opinion that in one way or another mental defectiveness is inherited. Tredgold in his famous book "Mental Deficiency" has estimated that over 80 per cent of persons suffering from the severe grades of amentia are the descendants of a pronounced neuropathic stock. Scientific researches carried out in Germany, Switzerland and America have greatly corroborated this estimate. At Reuton in the U. S. A. out of 1,000 cases of mental deficiency only 350 had both their parents normal.

There can hardly be a greater humanitarian ideal than to prevent this perpetuation of social misery. The problem is of special importance in a country like India where insanity is often combined with poverty and disease. Unfortunately, we have no accurate statistics as to the incidence of insanity in this country. According to official statistics the proportion of insane to sane is 3 per every 10,000, while in United Kingdom the proportion is roughly 40 per 10,000 and in New Zealand it is as much as 45 per 10,000. But the disparity between these proportions must not be taken at its face value. Our social conditions being what they are, it would be surprising if more than ten per cent of the cases of insanity are actually reported to the authorities. Not only the number of insanes is much larger than is indicated by official statistics, but the hospital accommodation for mental defectives is so inadequate that a large majority of insanes are left free to do what they like with themselves, even to marry and procreate. The number of insanes recorded in India and Burma is about 88,305, but we can provide hospital accommodation only for 6,750. Only one person in ten out of the total insane population recorded obtains accommodation in mental hospitals.

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

There is now no mental hospital in Bengal. Besides most of the mental hospitals except the one at Ranchi are over-crowded and under-staffed. So long as we are unable to keep a large majority of our insanes under proper care and treatment, there seems obviously no other way than sterilisation to check the proportion of mental diseases.

The problem has a unique significance in the peculiar context of our social conditions. We have only to refer to the social stigma which attaches to a girl belonging to a respectable family who remains unmarried beyond a certain age. She may be suffering from a most pernicious type of epilepsy or lunacy, but she is bound by the inexorable laws of society which require her without option to reproduce her type soon after marriage. Thus our own social customs and institutions act as powerful fertilisers for all kinds of mental misfits. One can understand the unwillingness of people to inflict upon their children the terrible vow of life-long celibacy, but they can at least prevent the multiplication of defectives by means of sterilisation. The need for sterilisation, therefore, is a more urgent proposition in India for women than for men, because it is easier for male defectives to remain unmarried without being placed in an awkward position.

In the case of the lower classes in India female sterilisation can be justified on medical grounds also. While living in an atmosphere of acute poverty and suffering from the evil effects of over-work and malnutrition, ignorant young girls in rural India are exposed to the frightful risks of recurrent conception. Child marriage, early maternity and repeated pregnancy—their entire span of life is summed up in this miserable chain of events which saps their pretty womanhood, turning them into physical and nervous wrecks as they slowly pass into the shadow of death. Sir John Megaw says, "No less than 100 out of every 1,000 girl-wives are doomed to die in child-birth before they have ceased to have babies and 200,000 mothers die in giving birth to children every year in India." For women, therefore, who have reached the point of exhaustion as a result of repeated pregnancy and who are incapable of exercising continuous self-discipline, either in the way of abstinence or birth control, sterilisation is the only possible protection against pregnancy and death.

It is a debatable point as to whether the use of sterilisation should be encouraged to restrict the growth of population. Under the German Eugenic Law sterilisation is allowed only for eugenic or medical reasons, but it must not be undertaken for limitation of families even when the persons seeking for it are suffering from acute economic distress. Infringement of this rule even with the consent of the patient will subject the physician to penal action on the ground of doing bodily harm. Similar provisions have been made in other countries also. It should be realised that a frivolous acceptance of it may make individuals permanently unhappy if at a later stage in life they desire to have children. In India at least where there is a general lack of education and culture, it seems unwise to legalise sterilisation except for eugenic or medical reasons.

In the beginning at any rate it is necessary that the State should confine itself only to permissive legislation. Any attempt at compulsory sterilisation may be interpreted by people as an invasion of their personal liberties. The principles of this great humanitarian movement have to be instilled into the public mind by a continuous educative propaganda so as to create a scientific outlook towards the spread of mental disease.

B. N. ADARKAR.

ALL THINGS EDIFY NOT.

It is by no means an unusual practice for men to walk with their hands on the shoulders of their companions who may even be grown up men or women. To the less demonstrative type, it is sometimes jarring to witness this. To my knowledge, however, none even of the finicky individuals who become dictators have legislated against such conduct. It was with some surprise, therefore, that I read Gandhiji's article in the current Harijan declaring his decision after much introspection to give up a harmless little habit which has grown on him these forty-five years. It appears that an inmate of the Sabarmati Ashram told Gandhiji some years ago that his practice of placing a hand on the shoulder of persons walking with him, "when extended to grown-up girls and women" offended accepted notions of decency. This officious attempt to control Gandhiji's conduct deservedly failed. But a more effective line of approach was taken up by two co-workers who suggested during a recent visit to Wardha, that it was likely to prove a bad example to others. "All things are lawful unto me but all things are not expedient.....If meat make my brother to offend, I will eat no flesh while the world standeth, lest I make my brother to offend," wrote S. Paul in his "First Epistle to the Corinthians," and very probably Gandhiji's comforters used a similar argument with him. The matter was clinched, so far as Gandhiji was concerned, by the conduct of a "bright university student" who under the threadbare cloak of brotherly love was inflicting his unwelcome attentions on a young girl in his control who was too weak to protest against this insidious attack. Incidentally, this seems to bear out the plea of a Muslim communicant from Hyderabad to a local newspaper that women, if they are to come out of purdah, should be trained in the "gentle art of snubbing" in which, according to him, English girls are so well-equipped, as also in the science of differentiating between "a gentleman and an impostor." This discovery of another useful field of co-operation between English and Indian girls need not detain us longer. Gandhiji, fearing lest the young delinquent should seek justification for his weakness in his own practice, decided to give it up and announced his decision to the Wardha Ashram on the 12th instant. Mahatmaji in writing of it confesses that it was with a pang that he arrived at his decision and virtually remarks that he himself regards it as a useless concession to carping critics. The practice to which Gandhiji has referred, is one that has been noticed not only by inmates of the ashrams but by others also who did not take it to be anything more than a mere habit. If I might reveal a secret, it was believed by a good number of Congressmen and women that Gandhiji's practice of resting a hand on his companion's shoulder arose from a desire to learn the fidelity of his devoted followers to the Khadi clause in the Congress constitution. This had induced a salutary fear in their minds and I should not be surprised if a desire for removing it was the real cause of the pressure applied by co-workers at Sabarmati and Wardha. The truth or otherwise of this will be revealed by statistics for Khadi sales in the next few months.

A problem which has been doubtless agitating many minds, is whether it was necessary for Gandhiji to announce his decision to the public. It has been suggested in certain quarters that as it is a resolution affecting only personal conduct Gandhiji need not have disclosed it to the public. There are, in my opinion, several objections to secrecy in a matter of this kind. In the first place, young imitators who exceed the bounds of decency, can be restrained from an irreverent "You did it too" only if they are told of the cessation resolution. In the second place publicity often ensures adherence to difficult decisions, as any smoker who has toyed with the idea of giving up tobacco can tell you. A third reason in favour of publicity, is the fact that Gandhiji's act of renunciation might stir his Congress colleagues to give up some cherished habit of theirs which hurts their neighbours. To begin with, one might request Mr. Rajagopalachariar to discard the dark glasses which have led so many journalists and public men into error, and Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel to refrain from the violent attacks on his Socialist co-workers which have given rise to so much heart-burning. And once one starts on this fascinating game there is no knowing where one will end. Lastly, there are several people who look on the practice with as innocent eyes as the Mahatma used to do, and they would regard as inexplicable the absence of this demonstration of kindly feeling except on grounds of a cooling off of affection. Whilst now they will realise that the only objection to the resumption of the old normal relations is that some busybodies have convinced the Mahatma that even to the pure all things cannot be pure.

Inasmuch as the recent decision will make Gandhiji self-conscious in the company of his old friends, it is most regrettable. The only ground on which, therefore, it can commend itself is that it will prevent some "bright young university students" from sinning. But will it? It seems to me too much to expect the ingenious young man who can justify his evil intentions by a reference to Gandhiji's harmless practice, to give them up after the renunciation of the Mahatma. He is more likely to take refuge in the excuse offered by Gandhiji's dictum later in the article that "My example was never meant for all and sundry." The article is valuable, however, for the important revelation that Gandhiji can no more understand the mentality behind the attitude of the erring young man and, if I might add, of the co-workers who asked him to renounce an age-old habit, than they can appreciate the innocence of his practice. Perhaps I am unfair to the young man. Gandhiji dismisses his point of view with the brief sentence, "he resents the slightest suggestion of impropriety." In fact Mahatmaj is unusually reticent about this young culprit. He even leaves the reader to find out whether his actions or his letters were more to blame. "Could I mention what the youth had been doing," commences the Mahatma in condemning him to the reader, and in the very next sentence a reference to "correspondence" intrudes on the subject. "When I read the correspondence, I came to the conclusion that the young man was a consummate hypocrite or was self-deluded." Gandhiji should have deputed the two complaining co-workers to investigate the matter fully. Any young man would resent the charge of impurity if it came from the Mahatma. A little tact and perseverance would have disclosed the hypocrite. If the young man was proved to the satisfaction of the co-workers to be self-deluded they could have quietly turned him over to Gandhiji for correction. And why drag in the university? Gandhiji's prejudice against university education has led him, I am afraid, to tack on to this incident the irrelevant moral that there is no sheep blacker than the educated one. This is a favourite theme with some of our Northern India journals where enough has been published about the bad manners and worse intentions of the Punjabi under-graduate, especially in relation to the innocent young women who are his fellow-students, to prevent the development of a healthy social life for another three generations. These, however, are minor matters. A larger issue is, How far should a leader of men allow his followers to intimidate him into following a course of action on the plea that he should set others an example? Much as Gandhiji is revered in India and abroad, far fewer men than he imagines seek to imitate him in everything he does. Moreover most of the "grown-up" girls to whom Gandhiji extends the practice, are, I take it, grown up enough to know the difference between Gandhiji and the next man. Any one who tried to follow in the Mahatma's footsteps in this matter would in six cases out of ten be rewarded by a smack on the jaw. In the remaining four cases the girl would be as much to blame as the man.

THE COLOURED PEOPLES AND ABYSSINIA.

The independence of the ancient kingdom of Abyssinia which has managed her own affairs for centuries is threatened to-day by a European power—Italy—who judging by the force and nature of her arms and armaments and the number of her soldiers and sailors on land, air and sea is bent more on destroying than conquering or colonising her for reasons both hypocritical and straightforward. Hypocritical, because she would have it that she wishes to colonise Abyssinia for purposes of civilizing it, and straightforward, because she wants Abyssinia by hook or by crook with a view to extend her imperial interests and find an outlet for her overgrowing population, so that in time Italy may extend her sway under the direction of the most powerful and ambitious of dictators the world has ever known—Signor Mussolini—and attain eventually the splendour and glory that was once the privilege and honour of the Empire of Rome. If Abyssinia was a forlorn desert no one would grudge Italy her designs. But she is a nation of some magnitude and has held her own for 8,000 years, developing herself on lines that are most suited to the needs of her people who are both contented and happy. The present Abyssinian Monarch is a descendant of that wise King Solomon of biblical fame and the Queen of Sheba. He is a powerful man of rare intelligence and initiative and is capable of guiding the destinies of Abyssinia without intervention from friend or foe. It was only four decades ago, on the 1st of March 1896 that his father inflicted a crushing defeat on the Italians at Adowa for attempting to encroach on Abyssinian territories, which was as decisive as the recent "knock out" of Carnera by the giant "coloured boxer." Abyssinia has since been recognised as a nation by the European nations and was admitted as a member of the League of Nations in 1923. So then, it will be seen that Abyssinia is a power and needs no civilizing influences from Italy which cannot see eye to eye with Abyssinia whose culture and civilization, not to speak of her customs and manners, are as different from Italy as the Poles are asunder. Abyssinia may as well turn round and say to Italy "You barbarians" and she would be perfectly justified in so doing as the conduct of Italy in trying to uproot a well established Kingdom for downright selfish motives, in the face of her solemn pledges to the League of Nations, by forceful aggression which has rightly called for the bitterest criticism from all over the world, is simply "barbarous." True to the spirit of peace as embodied in the constitution of the League of Nations, Abyssinia has not bothered to improve her fighting force believing firmly in the cause of peace and the integrity of nations, but Italy on the other hand has gone on improving her army, navy and air forces in defiance of peace contrary to the principles of the League of Nations, and is to-day proclaiming from the summits of the Alps that she is the strongest power in Europe, flouting reason and public opinion, disregarding covenants and agreements, which is indeed yet another reason for Abyssinia to believe that the nation that stands most in need of civilization to lay, is Italy and not herself.

Italy is bent on war and the other members of the League of Nations—Britain and France primarily and a host of others in Europe—are hesitating to apply the Sanctions against the aggressor in spite of their having covenanted to do so simply because they are afraid of the might of Italy which might set Europe ablaze again. The members of the League are in honour bound to apply the "Sanctions" against Italy irrespective of what the consequences will be and if they do not do so, they will be running the risk of losing their prestige and honour and being universally dubbed the "white feathered races" as their conduct would smack of cowardice. In justice however, to Great Britain, it must be said that true to her greatness she has so far stood by the covenant and has shown a willingness to go through with the Sanctions. But she cannot do it alone and the chief defaulter is France who wants Italy on her side in the event of Germany attacking her but she forgets that by her unseemly conduct in the present crisis, she is dealing a death blow to the League of Nations which might ultimately rebound against her one day to her regret. France's fear is the growing strength of Germany and if Germany had been the aggressor instead of Italy, France would have urged the application of the Sanctions with a vengeance. Why, even now, in the present case, if Abyssinia had been the aggressor instead of Italy the members of the League of Nations would have by now clipped her wings and made her unrecognizable in the map of Africa. And yet how dilatory they are with regard to Italy even after knowing Italy is definitely in the wrong. France is still afraid of Germany and all her "funk" is the result of that nightmare which is so possessing her that codes of honour and decency do not cut any ice with her at present. So is Italy so selfish that she has no regard for covenants honourably undertaken. But nevertheless the coloured races of Asia, Africa, and America including Japan and China are watching the conduct of the "civilized nations of Europe" and should unhappily the "civilized nations" fail to impose the sanctions on the aggressor as they had covenanted to do and let Abyssinia be trampled down by Italy, they would view it as the shabbiest deal that has ever been meted out by the white races to the coloured peoples and would look upon it as an insult and injury to themselves which might ultimately lead to trouble all over the world far transcending any puny war between Italy and Abyssinia. So far as Great Britain is concerned she cannot afford to throw her weight with a small section of Europeans against the weight of opinion of her own coloured subjects who form 75 % of the world's population encompassing three-fourths of the globe. Is she going to displease this mighty horde of loyal peoples against her own interests for the sake of a tiny strip of land called Italy in the south of Europe?

A NEW SMRITI FOR THE AGE.

(FROM A CORRESPONDENT.)

Mr. S. D. Nadkarni, founder of the Hindu Sabha at Karwar, was invited by Barrister V. D. Savarkar on behalf of the Hindu Sabha of Ratnagiri to take part in the all-Hindu Ganapati celebrations organised by him on the occasion of the tenth anniversary of the foundation of the latter Sabha. In the course of the celebrations which were conducted in the spacious precincts of the beautiful pan-Hindu temple there, which is dedicated to God Patita-pavan (Lakshmi-Narayan), and where no caste distinctions are observed. Mr. Nadkarni addressed a meeting on the 10th inst. The Marathi script-reformer, Mr. D. K. Devdhar of Bombay, presided. The following is an English summary of Mr. Nadkarni's speech in Marathi on his proposal to issue an all-Hindu manifesto in the form of a Smriti suited to the needs and aspirations of the present age.

Relating how he lighted upon the idea of issuing a new Smriti for this age, Mr. Nadkarni said, "When about 10 to 12 years ago, I was doing anti-Untouchability work at Karwar, I used to conduct propaganda generally on secular grounds and to base my arguments mostly on wordly considerations. But when the anti-reformers objected on scriptural and spiritual grounds, I used to meet their arguments on their own ground with texts in favour of the reform hunted out of the Scriptures. They, however, did not appear to be satisfied with them. They used to wrest and twist the words of the texts out of their plain meanings to suit their own views and would wrestle over innocent particles and wrangle over prepositions and terminations. They would also present me with texts apparently adverse to the reform. This led me to think that I had better put down my own thoughts in the form of precepts and injunctions unequivocally in Sanskrit verses on the subject of Untouchability and all other matters in which Hindu society stood in need of reform. So I drew up a draft. But subsequently a doubt assailed me. What would be its use? But it is written: 'The secret of faith lies in the cave,' (धर्मस्य तस्य निहितं गुहायाम्). And by 'cave' here is meant, of course, the human heart. But supposing one were to take the text literally and were to say that the spirit of old Manu the law-giver, beholding the present sorry plight of his progeny in these days, incarnated itself on the shore of the Western Sea and, leaving a new Smriti composed by him in a cave of the Western Ghats near my town for the well-being of his progeny, vanished;—now supposing one had tried to push forward the claims of one's Smritified composition with such legends, the questions would still have remained,—first, whether and how far the attempt would succeed in this critical wide-awake age, and, second, whether even if the device did succeed, it would be desirable. So I resolved that if at all a new Smriti should see the light of day in these democratic times, it should make its appearance only by ways familiar to democracy. So I decided that copies of the draft Smriti with a comprehensive questionnaire should be circulated to men and woman of light and leading throughout the Hindu world, in order to elicit their suggestions and opinions, and that these should be placed before a Committee to be elected by those leaders for the purpose of settling the final form of the draft."

"As soon as the draft is settled," said Mr. Nadkarni, "it should be put into Sanskrit verses and also rendered into all the vernaculars and into English also and published simultaneously in all these languages with the imprimature of Hindu leaders of different castes and creeds and drawn from all provinces."

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Sept. 28

"If necessary," continued Mr. Nadkarni, "a compilation may be made of suitable texts from all the old Hindu scriptural literature, that it may find its place by the side of the new Smriti as a supplementary work to support that, our original document. This subsidiary work should serve the same purpose that the Old Testament does in relation to the New, among the Christians. And like it also, our compilation of texts from the old Sastras and cullings from the lives and words of the Saints and Sages of Hindudom of past ages—this upabrinhana—should be treated as the minor or secondary part of the whole work so formed. This scriptural work of all the Hindus so produced will doubtless conduce to the welfare and advancement of all the Hindus in all directions."

Concluding, the lecturer noticed "an objection voiced in some quarters, that all the Smritis we now have are works which only record customs and usages actually prevailing at the time of their production; and that therefore the doctrines that we are going to preach through our new Smriti should first be followed by the people in considerable numbers, or in other words that they should first find acceptance in actual practice among the people and then be recorded in our Smriti. My reply to this is—It is not an altogether correct view of the origin or function of the old Smritis to say that they only recorded customs then in existence. For I could point out several texts in them in which certain customs are mentioned only to be reprobated and abrogated. Therefore it would not be proper to insist that all the precepts in our new Smriti should first be followed by the people and then recorded in it. However, let me say, even that objection loses its force now when we find that during the space of these ten years passed since the foundation of the Ratnagiri Hindu Sabha, most of the things we are going to preach through our Smriti that is to be have actually been practised in the open by the Hindu citizens at large here in this blessed town of Ratnagiri under the holy shadow of the Patita-pavan Temple with the inspiring, forceful, self-sacrificing guidance of Dharma-bhai Savarkar Mahashay."

SIR T. VIJIARAGHAVACHARYA'S EUROPEAN IMPRESSIONS.

Sir T. Vijiaraghavachariar, Vice-Chairman of the Imperial Council of Agricultural Research, delivered the inaugural address on the 18th of the Intermediate College Association, writes the Bangalore correspondent of the Hindu.

He spoke of his impressions of his visit to the European countries and America in 1924 to 1926 and compared them with those which he formed during his visit to those countries last year.

The face of Europe appeared quite free from trouble in 1924-26. But there had been a tremendous change when he visited those countries last year. The whole phase of the country had completely changed. On the European Continent, including Great Britain, with the exception of France and England, the old notions of freedom had disappeared. Even as early as October 1934, when the speaker was in Europe, he could hear the rumblings of the trouble that was now threatening Europe. In Italy, under Mussolini, things were much improved and there was a wonderful improvement in the spirit which animated every Italian. Public services had been purified. In Germany, the prevailing spirit was not certainly of peace. Practically all the young men in Germany underwent martial exercises. A complete change had come over the spirit of Europe. It would be a mistake for people to assume that either in Italy or in Germany, it was fear that held the people together. In Germany, the people felt that Hitler was the first man who had put self-respect into the nation. It would be a great mistake for anybody to assume that it was pure despotism either in Germany or Italy. In England, he continued, the atmosphere was quite different. One could feel that it was a free country where he could say anything he liked. In Rome, a different atmosphere prevailed. The atmosphere was such that people never used the name of Mussolini in public. The speaker while he was there last year used to have frequent discussions with the journalists. They never used the name of Mussolini. Code words were used. One time it was 'Smith,' at another it was 'John,' One day it was 'Tomatoes,' (Laughter.) The same atmosphere prevailed in Germany. One had to be much more careful in Germany than in Italy; that did not mean that the stranger was not welcome. The only thing was that the visitor had to keep clear of politics.

"The old notions of freedom, to which we have got accustomed," continued the speaker, "the freedom of speech, liberty to do what you liked, subject to prosecution under the law, was preserved in England and in France also. In other countries, it was quite different. It looked to me that Europe was far from being in a peaceful state. It is a question of some kind of an economic recovery and of the bankers advancing loans and that will be the end of peace. I think it is not too strong a statement to say that peace hangs on a balance in Europe." Obviously, the war to end war had proved a useless experiment. With the great advance they had made in Science, the next war would be fought more efficiently than the last world war.

What was required at the present moment Sir T. V. Achariar said, was a change in the mental attitude of the people. It was there where young men could play a part. Many of them must have noticed the remarkable way in which both the Oxford and Cambridge University men were enthusiastic and had taken pledges that they would not fight. It was this spirit which had to be developed and spread. He knew some people would scout the idea and say that in the face of armed nations, there was no use of preaching ideas. These critics would say that the unarmed prophet who preached peace went only to its destruction. But he would ask whether ideas and ideals had not spread and taken firm root and revolutionised society? He would only refer them to the ideals of Christ and the Lord Budha and the wonders they had worked. Ideals pursued by enthusiastic people in the right spirit would, in course of time, prevail against men in arms.

The only efficient cure that he saw for the present day situation was by the spread of ideas. His hope for the future was in the young men and he would therefore appeal to them to practise and preach ideas. If external wars in Europe and internal wars in India were to be prevented—the speaker was really interested more in the latter than in the former—he thought that it was very necessary that young men should get rid of the idea of superiority and inferiority. If young men in India could learn that the great object in life was not to have music before mosques or a thousand and one things which led to these communal differences, but that they all belonged to India and that India was first in their heart, irrespective of the fact that they were Muslims, Hindus, Sikhs, Christians, Parsis, etc., the politics of the next 50 years in India would be very much cleaner and better than the politics of the present day.

The immediate lesson that the young in India should learn was, he said, that religious differences in India should not count. The only hope of having a real nationhood in India was by relegating these religious differences to their proper place and keeping them outside the public life.

In conclusion, Sir T. Vijiaraghvachariar said, "What is required is that all over Europe, the younger men must take this philosophy of life: Differences of religion do not matter—differences of colour do not matter—what matters is really the human mind and the intellect."

JUDGE STRATHIE'S ADVICE TO LABOUR LEADERS.*

After delivering judgment in the case against Messrs. J. Ramalingaiah and two other Socialist Workers of Guntur against whom the Police placed charge-sheets under the Indian Press (Emergency Powers) Act, convicting them each to a simple imprisonment for six months, Mr. D. N. Strathie, I.C.S., District Magistrate, presented the accused with two books one by Joad and entitled 'Liberty To-day' and the other a copy of Galsworthy's plays and said by way of advice to the youths:

I have found you guilty and I am sending you to prison. I want first to say a few words to you in the hope that they will do some good. I realise that I am in the position of a preacher and that you cannot very well answer me at this stage. But I do wish to take advantage of my privileged position. First I trust you will realise that in sending you to prison I am acting in pursuance of what I conscientiously believe to be my duty. I trust you will not bear any ill-will against me or against the Government I represent. In particular, I trust you will not accuse me, as you have accused the Magistrate in your drama, pamphlet No. 7, of being bribed by the local factory owners. For up to a point, I am with you and if I were a Dictator here I would immediately introduce some of the reforms for which you ask in your pamphlet No. 9. I am moreover willing to believe that you have been acting conscientiously.

What I want you to appreciate is that if your object is to improve the conditions of labouring classes you are certainly going the wrong way about it. In the first place—as I have tried to bring out in my judgment—you are relying for the success of your efforts almost wholly on stirring up class hatred. No good can ever come of that. Secondly, you are displaying your youthful ignorance by imagining and leading your ignorant hearers to imagine that the lot of the workers can be immediately benefitted by a radical change in the organisation of industry and the substitution of the present entrepreneurs by (presumably) representatives of the workers, presumably men like yourself.

I would ask you to ponder a few questions. What do you really know about the organisation of Industry? Do you seriously think that you could run Maddi Venkata Subbaya's tobacco factory (the proprietor of a local tobacco factory) if through a rising of the workers you did get control over it? Do you think anybody would lend you any capital? You may answer that under your regime the banks would also be under your control and that State Capital would be disbursed to you. How long do you fancy you would keep it? What do you know about large scale finance? What do you know about tobacco, its buying, grading and marketing? I have no hesitation in assuring you and all your friends that within two months the coolies you have deluded would be in the streets living on doles, that there would soon be a serious shortage of tobacco and that within 12 months the nation would be bankrupt and you and the coolies would be starving.

*Justice.

You have been extolling the merits of the new regime in Russia and telling your listeners how happy the workers are there now-a-days. I wonder where you got the information and whether you have heard the other side of the picture, how the change was effected at the cost of oceans of blood, stupendous misery not only for the rich but for the middle classes and the poor, how the practical effect has been at the best to substitute one tyranny for another, how the workers in Russia (except the successful few who rise to be like yourself labour leaders) now live herded in barracks under the strictest discipline. How 70 per cent of the railway workers for instance, making about two million, have recently been punished under an all embracing Article (iii) of the Soviet Criminal Code, which makes neglect of duty a criminal offence, how family life, which means so much to Indians in particular has been destroyed, how private property has been largely eliminated, how the private property that remains is no longer safe from hands of thieves owing to the inefficiency of the new Executive, how the peasants who produce the essential food-stuffs you mention in pamphlet No. 6, are also herded in barracks away from their families and have during the last 2 years starved as there was a partial failure of crops and the bulk of the crops that remained were sent to the cities to feed the organised labour in the huge new factories.

Do you realise that personal liberty has largely disappeared in Russia, that people like you, for instance, who dared to criticise the existing form of Government would have been put up against a wall and shot months ago. In all sincerity I would urge you to employ the few months' leisure you are going to secure, if my decision is up-held, in studying the complexities of the organisation of the State and of Industry and in acquiring some really reliable information about that country which you are taking as your model. In the way of helping you I propose to present you with two books, one a copy of Joad's 'Liberty To-day' which will I hope convince you of the merits of those institutions which you are trying to destroy and the other a copy of Galsworthy's plays, where you will see how it is possible for a labour advocate to write on the sufferings of the poor and criticise the administration of justice without imputing vile motives to the rich as a whole and bringing himself within the clutches of the Criminal Law.

The Viceroy-Elect.—Though a gentleman burglar strolled out of Lord Lintithgow's London House last year with 5,000 worth of jewelry including a sapphire tiara matching the next Viceroy's eyes, the Marquess is rated "poor" for so costly a post as Viceroy (salary $ 97,500). Indians will find him the tallest of Britain's long line of moose-tail Viceroys, and in India the fact that Queen Victoria was his godmother will help. An urbane humorist, the new Viceroy when stimulated can be counted on to provoke well-bred hilarity with his "Imitation of a Maiden Aunt at a Children's Party." On the links he is a keen golfer, on the parade ground a tremendous trumpeter, at the piano a smooth tenor. Six foot Lady Lintithgow is an acceptable soprano, better at tennis which she plays on the French Riviera every winter with Sweden's moose-tail King Gustaf. Twins, the eldest children, the Earl of Hopetoun and Lord John Hope, now 23, will stay on in London with the King's swank Scots Guards, while "The Baby" Lady Doreen Hope, 15, remains in boarding school. To New Delhi for the fun and splendor of the Viceregal Court go Lady Anne, 21, and Lady Joan, 19. The whole family was vexed when the Soviet Ambassador moved in next door to their house in Chesham Place and strange-looking people began punching their bell. Promptly Lord Lintithgow installed a shiny brass door plate: "This is NOT the Russian Embassy." (Time).

DRINK CONTROL.

Those who manufacture and sell intoxicating liquors are continually demanding that the restrictions placed upon the retail sale of liquor shall be relaxed. A vigorous campaign was recently carried on in certain centres in England to change the night closing hour from ten o'clock to ten-thirty. This was not permitted.

The liquor interests insist that the public should be allowed their freedom in the matter of purchasing drinking liquor and they are restive under any sort of restraints or restrictions that are placed upon them.

The question may well be asked as to why any restrictions or limitations have been placed upon the sale of intoxicating drinks. If, as the advertisements tell us, liquor is such a great boon to mankind, one naturally wonders why any restrictions should be placed upon its manufacture and sale. From the first there must have been no such restrictions. When in the early days men manufactured and drank their own crude types of liquor and gave it or sold it to their neighbours there could have been no restrictions. How did it happen that restrictions have been placed upon the sale of intoxicants, while no restrictions are placed upon the sale of flour? Anyone with even the most elementary understanding could answer this question. The reason is that the sale of liquor in unrestricted quantities and at all hours, results in social conditions that are not desirable. Places where drinking men congregate far into the night become a menace, and to have unlimited carousing gives a bad name to any locality. Since this is so, there are very few who raise any objection whatever to certain restrictions being placed upon the sale of intoxicants.

It is recognized that Society is justified in restricting the sale of intoxicants. The only question to be decided is the degree of restriction that is required. Prohibition, they tell us, carries the restriction too far. But in the last analysis is not society to judge regarding the effects of intoxicants upon those who use them? And if it is shown that those who indulge in intoxicants are damaging themselves and also are liable to be a danger to others, will not society be justified in making such restrictions as will save individuals from harm and also society from danger? It seems to us this is a conclusion that cannot be escaped. Society has not only the right but the duty to prevent men and women from drinking intoxicants to the extent that they themselves are harmed or that anyone else is placed in danger. Sooner or later this obligation of society will be recognized. It will mean restrictions such as do not exist in most countries. It will mean the limiting of the sales of intoxicants to a degree not now known. And as this is done, it will be discovered that the easiest and surest way for society to protect itself will be thorough prohibition.

Whatever may have happened in the past, the future lies with prohibition for it is only by prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicant liquors that society can protect itself against the harm which comes from their use. Those who are discouraged with the progress which the Temperance Movement is making, should realize that the doom of the liquor trade is written in the evil effects that come from the use of liquor. What is needed is further education and a better understanding of the evil effects of alcoholic drink and the time for giving this education is now.

WHEAT FROM MOHENJO-DARO.

While eminent Indologists are at a loss to trace the link, still supposed to be missing, which connects the prehistoric Mohenjo-daro civilisation of India with the historic civilisation flourishing in North India on the banks of the vedic river Saraswati, botanists are confident to reap and restore the agricultural harvest of that prehistoric age. This has been possible as the direct result of the industry of Sir Daniel Hamilton in trying to introduce in his estates in the Sunderbans in Bengal and in Mayurbhanj in Bihar, the seeds which he purchased at a shilling an ounce from a mission in England, which succeeded in reproducing an ancient ear of wheat obtained from a tomb in the excavations in Mohenjo-daro. The seeds were sold for the benefit of the mission in England. In accordance with instructions given for implanting the seeds in Sir Daniel's estates, particular care was taken of the soil and the protection of the plants from goats and rats. The Mohenjo-daro wheat plants grew well at both the places. But at Sunderbans more seeds could not be obtained for want of rain. Another fresh attempt is being made to implant the seeds.

The wheat, it is said, is of a peculiar type, each head having small branches up to nine in number springing from it. Judging from the weight of grain produced, it is unusually prolific. It is well-known to historians that the practice of placing wheat in tombs for the nourishment of the deceased in the spirit world was well-known to antiquity. And the ear of wheat from which ears are now being reproduced may have been buried for 4,000 years. It was announced by the mission which sold this wheat to Sir Daniel that there is no older grain like the Mohenjo-daro wheat in the world today. An analysis taken at the Agricultural Research Institute at Pusa led to the report that the "food value of the wheat compares favourably with that of our Pusa wheat."

WHY COUE FAILED.

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

We don't see anything in the papers nowadays about the once popular Couéism: "Every day in every way I'm getting better and better." This philosophy passed away because it appealed, not to the soul, but only to the mind.

True philosophy makes a man exclaim: "Every day in every way I'm getting worse and worse." When a man's soul is steadfastly fixed upon God, when his conduct is grounded upon virtue and right principles, when his purposes in life are true, good, and unchangeable, he can afford to regard with indifference and even to despise afflictions and evils that discourage and overwhelm the majority of people.

Such a man can derive pleasure from contemplating the miseries that afflict him, for all his miseries do not touch his soul which has a life apart from the life of his body and cannot be affected by evils that touch his body and affect his worldly estate and prospects. He is, of course, aware of his miseries, but he is able to laugh at them. When he considers his poverty, his obscurity, his loneliness, his bodily infirmities, his old age and failing powers, all gradually increasing from day to day, he says, indeed, with his lips, "Every day in every way I'm getting worse and worse," but in his soul he laughs at all these troubles, for his soul is strong, happy, and eternal because it is united with God who is strong.

happy, and eternal. He even takes pleasures in contemplating and enumerating his troubles one by one, for thereby he is always reminded of the unalterable and imperishable well-being of his soul.

This is my philosophy. I think that it will outlive Coue's.

"STERILISATION—THE SUPREME CONTRACEPTIVE."

The Editor,
The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

Owing to the fact that the use of birth control remedies for purposes of limiting families is expensive and beyond the means of people of very limited means, sterilisation seems to find increasing favour with the public. Its wider use is however retarded by the general belief that the operation is irrevocable, that once it is performed, it is past correction. This does not however appear to be strictly correct. In a book entitled "The Case for Sterilisation" by Leon F. Whitney which is edited by Dr. Norman Haire, Ch. M., M. B. and published by John Lane the Bodley Head, it is stated on p. 18 that many surgeons are confident that the correcting operation can be effectually done; while others are doubtful. It is added: "Such a correcting operation is a far more delicate procedure than the original vasectomy, though it is not dangerous; one side only would have to be reconnected, since the sperm-cells from one testicle would be more than enough to insure fertility." A footnote on the same page says: "Professor Schmerz, of Gratz, in Austria, gave evidence under oath in a court of law that he had successfully restored fertility by a plastic operation on the sperm-ducts, after having sterilised patients at an earlier date by vasectomy; and he brought forward some cases in proof of his statement." I doubt not that this information will strengthen the hands of people who advocate sterilisation as a method of unfailing birth control.

Hard on the Doctor:—On giving birth to her first child, the plaintiff's wife had an exceedingly difficult and dangerous time and her physician told her she must not have another child as it would endanger her life. Her husband therefore had the operation of vasectomy performed upon himself. The doctor told him that the operation was successful and guaranteed that he was sterile. Nevertheless, his wife became pregnant again and after a difficult delivery gave birth to another child. The plaintiff sued the doctor who operated on him for the anxiety he and his wife underwent during the second pregnancy and childbirth, and for the expenses incurred. The Supreme Court of Minnesota and the Supreme Court decided that vasectomy under the circumstances was not against public policy, was perfectly justified and that the plaintiff was therefore justified in suing the doctor. It held that sterilization of the husband was justifiable, it does not impair but frequently improves the vigour of the patient, and except for his inability to beget children, he is every bit as capable physically and mentally as before. Under the circumstances therefore the contract was not void as against public policy, nor the performance of the operation illegal.—The Critic and Guide, June 1935.

Mahatma Gandhi to Visit Japan.—A Reuter's message from Tokio dated August 28 stated that Mahatma Gandhi has written to friends and admirers stating that he is looking forward to his visit to Japan. We, however, are unaware, writes Indian Opinion of any intention on the part of Mahatma Gandhi of visiting Japan.

NOTES

Mr. Vaikunth Mehta on the Co-operative Movement:—The Madras Provincial Co-operative Conference which met at Coimbatore last Saturday, could not have made a better choice for its president than Mr. Vaikunth Mehta. In his quiet assuming way he has in the course of the last twenty years made himself one of the most competent authorities on the subject of Co-operation both in its theoretical and practical sides. He is besides in close touch with such movements as Gandhiji's village reconstruction and Harijan schemes. He is, therefore, peculiarly qualified to form and express a well-considered opinion as to the achievements and failures of the Co-operative Movement in the past, its present position and the lines on which it can do most good in the future. On all three aspects of the problem, his presidential address casts much-needed light. He does not indeed dwell much on the past because the present depression has created new problems to the solution of which past experience affords but slender guidance. As for the present Mr. Mehta points out that, while complete rehabilitation of the cultivating classes could be ensured only by a recovery of world conditions, some measures of alleviation which would have been helpful have not been adopted by Government in India. The improvement that has taken place in the outlook before the cotton cultivators, he observes, is primarily due to measures inaugurated in the United States in America. But serious doubts are beginning to be entertained in the States about the effects of the measures for raising prices adopted three years ago, on the home industry; and, if America reverts as it may, to its normal policy, the outlook for the cotton cultivator in India would be seriously affected. It is, therefore, much to be regretted that the Government of India have not only been remiss in not doing anything to help the Indian cultivator, but that Sir James Grigg should be in a position to prevent such measures from being adopted now or in the near future. Mr. Mehta spoke with unaccustomed emphasis on the retrograde policy which the Finance Member is bent upon enforcing in India. Mr. Mehta dealt in some detail with the utilisation of the special grant to Madras Presidency of Rs. 14 lakhs for rural development. He is quite right in saying that the four items on which the Madras Government propose to spend that amount—namely, water supply, roads, sanitation and anti-malarial measures—should be met out of the ordinary revenue and that the grants should be used in ways which are calculated to increase the income of the rural population. Mr. Mehta was astonished that, in spite of the Co-operative Movement, the agricultural indebtedness in Madras has increased, according to the Special Officer's Report, by over Rs. 50 crores during the last five years. This in a province which has had a special run of prosperity under the Meston Settlement, is conclusive proof of the unreality of the success claimed for Dyarchy in Madras.

The Bombay Special Powers Bill:—On the 12th September the Indian Legislative Assembly after seven days debate rejected the Criminal Law Amendment Bill (since enacted into Law by certification process) the objects of which were stated by the Home Member of the Government of India to be to combat civil disobedience, communism and terrorism. The Home Member of the Bombay Government introducing another Bill on Tuesday in the Provincial Legislative Council stated the objects of his bill which were also the same, namely, to deal with civil disobedience, communism and terrorism. This is evidently intended to stop any little gaps that might be left by the Indian Act through which the civil disobedience man, the communist or the terrorist may escape. But there is one difference. While the Home and Law Members of the Government of India bent their endeavours to proving the existence of terrorism, the Bombay Home Member admitted that it did not exist in this Presidency. Nevertheless he wanted the powers renewed permanently as civil disobedience which is now out of operation, terrorism which does not exist, and communism of which he had only very vague proofs, might any day become menaces to peace and order. It is obvious that whether the perils exist or not the Executive is determined to have these extra powers. The Executive having tasted the sweets of arbitrary power do not want to let it go. Perhaps, they have lost the ability to govern under the ordinary law. The situation now is this: that while a murderer, a forger, a dacoit, is entitled to the presumption of law that every one should be regarded as innocent until proved guilty, a person suspected of terrorism, communism or civil disobedience will be treated as if the guilt against him needed no proof. This is what Sir Govind Madgaoker, who retired two years ago from the Bench of the Bombay High Court, concludes after a careful analysis of the clauses of the Bombay Bill in his communication which we print today. He further holds that the language of the Bill is general and in no way confined to communists, terrorists or passive resisters but includes and is capable of being directed against law-abiding citizens who might happen to incur the suspicion of the Police.

Englishmen in India:—It is regarded as axiomatic nowadays that the Englishman in this country must remain a stranger and sojourner. This is a consequence of the Imperialistic ideas which found place in British Indian policy during the third quarter of the last century. Prior to that there were many Englishmen who regarded themselves and were regarded by their Indian neighbours as good as people of the soil. Pleasing pictures of the intimate relations which existed between Indians and Englishmen, are found in George Birdwood's "Sva." Be it remembered that Indians were far more conservative then than now; and eating and drinking in company with people of castes other than their own, was strictly prohibited. Indeed, Birdwood says that his most intimate Hindu friend, who confided to him his domestic troubles and sought his advice in all important personal matters, would bathe after shaking hands with him. This was not meant and was not taken as a personal slight. It was an item of Hindu orthodoxy, and respected as such. This type of Englishmen has not altogether become extinct. Mr. Robert Foulkes of Salem in the Madras Presidency, who died recently seems to have been a man of this type. We reprint the tribute to him by Justice. Mr. G. I. Griffiths whose death last week at an early age called forth warm tributes from all sides in the Bombay Municipal Corporation on Monday, was a man of the same type. Sir J. B. Boman-Behram mentioned that because of his pro-Indian sentiments, the European Association would not put him up as a candidate at the Municipal elections and that he secured his seat independently of European support. He could do this because there is no communal European constituency in the Municipal electorate. But he would be shut off from the Legislature since he could stand only for a European constituency.

The Press Laws and the Penal Code:—Judge Strathie in his judgment in the case against three members of the Labour Protection League of Guntur to which we referred last week, tried to understand why the prosecution was launched under the Press law and not under the Penal Code. He thought that it was due to an interpretation put by the Bombay High Court upon the word "class," in the section of the Penal Code dealing with the offence of promoting hatred and contempt against any class of His Majesty's subjects. There is a more simple explanation. We reprint in another place the part of the speech, in the Legislative Assembly, of the Leader of the Opposition, Mr. Bhulabhai Desai, which gives it in the authoritative language of eminent Judges of High Courts. In the first place, the Press law, reversing the ordinary principle of the Penal Code, fixes the burden of proof upon the accused, a great advantage to the prosecution. More important still, from the point of view of the prosecution, it requires the accused to show not only that his writing is not likely, nor has it the tendency, to bring about ill-feeling between classes. He must go further and show that it is impossible for it to have that tendency, directly or indirectly. In the words of former Chief Justice of Calcutta High Court, Sir Lawrence Jenkins, there was no article on earth, however innocent, which does not come within the clutches of the law. Even a standard work of literature—the New Testament even—can easily come under this Act.

Nazis and the Justice Party:—The Catholic Leader thinks that the anti-Semitic measures of the Nazi regime in Germany are analogous, not, as we suggested (September 21), to the inhibitions imposed by custom on the relations between the general body of Hindus and the antyajias, but to the anti-Brahmin movement in Southern India. "What would be a more correct comparison," it observes, "is the revolt in Southern India against the privileged position occupied by Brahmins in public life till recently. The new measures taken against Jews, though unusual and not in accordance with the traditions of European nations (the Catholic Leader does not evidently rely on historical facts for its opinions) are mainly due to the tremendous power and influence wielded by them in the national life and foreign policy of Germany. It is the belief of the German Nazis that until and unless the Jewish predominance in the services of the country and in the control of national finance is broken down, the Jews would prove a source of danger to the welfare of the State. Similar conditions prevailed also in this Presidency until the formation of the Justice Party which by its vigorous campaign against Brahmin ascendancy in the public professions obtained an equitable share for all communities in public life." There is much in the comparison instituted between the German Nazis and the Justice Party which we are not concerned to deny.

Jews, Catholics and Brahmins—Our observations regarding the similarity between the anti-Semitic marriage laws and other measures having for their avowed object the social isolation of Jews in Germany, were suggested by the statement in one of the recent pan-Jewish conferences that the position of Jews in that country was worse than that of untouchables in India. If it was merely the elimination of the preponderance of Jews in public life which the Nazis have in view, it could have been effected by a quota system covering recruitment to the public services and even to admission to educational institutions such as has been instituted by the British Indian Government. However that may be, the Catholic Leader does not extend its benevolence to the Nazi measures against Catholics in Germany, who, and not Jews, are comparable to Brahmins in India. If the Nazis are justified in putting down the predominance of Jews in German public life on the ground that it is opposed to national interests, they may plead the same justification—and indeed they do—for their measures relating to the Catholic Church. But, no. The Leader would have none of it. "As the Catholic Church has been the strongest and most powerful opponent of the un-Christian measures of the Nazi Government," it avers, "systematic organised attempts have been made to compel the Church to fall in line with the new German pagan ideals." Herr Hitler is himself a Catholic and his policy towards his own Church has not the taint of race prejudice which obviously inspires his anti-Jewish measures.

Is it War?—As we go to press, unconfirmed news that Italian troops have crossed the Abyssinian Frontier is published. It is now only a question of days, perhaps, hours, before the dogs of war are unleashed. Signor Mussolini in an impassioned address at a test mobilisation on Wednesday of the civilian population throughout Italy, adjured them to stand by him for the glory of their country which, he said, had not received the reward due to her for the great sacrifices which she made for the Allied cause during the last War. Italy did not break the Triple Alliance and go over to the Allied side until she had been assured of her reward. Her contribution to the victory of the Allies was far less than was expected and than Signor Mussolini claims. In any case, the failure of the Allies to reward her adequately for her timely defection from the Triple Alliance, should not be visited on Abyssinia. Mussolini's reasoning is all wrong, although we are sure he quite believes in it. If Abyssinia has given reason for provocation, other than refusing to accept Italy as her overlord, she has offered to submit her case to arbitration which Signor Mussolini does not want. The one thing which is clear is that he wishes Italy to rival the British and French colonial empires. He is piqued that while small countries like Belgium, Holland and Portugal have large coloured territories under their sway, Italy should be denied the same privilege.

His action brings to an issue the whole subject of European exploitation of the coloured races. General Smuts sees that it bodes no good to the White races. Signor Mussolini does not care what becomes of the White races if he is not allowed to share the spoils of Africa equally with the others. But for our faith in the doctrine of Karma, we should find considerable difficulty in continuing to believe that there is a just God guiding the destiny of nations.

The Kavitha Incident—Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel's intervention has brought about a peaceful settlement of the conflict between caste Hindus and antyajias in Kavitha village, which had gone from bad to worse and threatened to end in worst. The Sardar left the question of children of caste Hindus and the antyajias attending the same school to be solved by their own good sense; and he persuaded the two factions to give up the boycott and settle down to normal conditions. We are in favour of children of all classes being educated in common schools. But it would be pushing a good principle too far to compel them to do so against a strong current of prejudice without first taking steps to remove the prejudice. Further, communal schools are maintained and supported from the public revenues in the case of Europeans and Muslims, and there is no equity in withdrawing grants from schools attended by caste Hindu children if there is a prejudice against their being educated along with antyaja children. This prejudice can be overcome and, in one conspicuous instance within our knowledge was very effectively overcome by the Bombay Depressed Classes Mission started a quarter of a century ago by the Prarthna Samaj. The school conducted by the Mission in Ghadiali Buildings (new demolished), in Parel with Mr. V. S. Sohoni as Headmaster, was so efficient that caste Hindus of the neighbourhood sent their children to it to sit side by side with antyaja children in preference to the municipal school nearby. The Harijan Seva Sangh at Sabarmati should now try this method in Kavitha and we are sure it will succeed. Where imprecations and invocations of official pressure are of no avail, conciliatory action will win over the orthodox caste Hindus who, after all, are as much victims of prejudice as the antyajias. The use of harsh terms such as 'tyranny' are to be deprecated in this beneficent movement as they carry with them associations which irritate those whose co-operation is vital to its success.

Conversions and Gandhiji—Mahatma Gandhi has indicated from time to time his disapproval of proselytising. In the current Harijan he has, in response to an invitation from an Indian Christian friend, put in plain and unmistakable language his considered view on the question particularly of mass conversions. We reprint the passage in another column. We are in agreement with every word of it.

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

BOMBAY, October 5, 1935.

THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS AND ITALY.

The adjournment of the Council of the League of Nations last Saturday to determine the origin of the Italo-Ethiopian dispute, marks a period in the League negotiations with Signor Mussolino which have been carried on at times under humiliating conditions. It also gives the public a little breathing-space in which to consider the issues involved in the dispute. Signor Mussolini objected strongly to all the proposals of the League because he held Ethiopia's position at Geneva to be conditional on her carrying out certain reforms and, as she had not done so, she could not claim the rights of a member of the League. Therefore he urged that Ethiopia's case was not covered by the Covenant. In short, while Japan and Germany forsook Geneva when they contemplated a breach of the Covenant, Italy seeks to utilise the League for expelling her intended victim. The League has been criticised by Italy for intervening when it had not the capacity to settle the dispute. It has been condemned, on the other hand, by supporters of Abyssinia on the ground that the recommendations of its Committee of Five are calculated to establish a regime worse than an Italian conquest would bring about in Abyssinia. The Committee reported to the League on September 25 and it is noteworthy that the proposals differ radically from those of the Tripartite Treaty of Paris between Britain, France and Italy in 1908. As the Italian delegate at Geneva announced, the proposals do not concede, as that Treaty did, a right to Italy to link up Eritrea and Italian Somaliland by means of a railway running through Ethiopia west of Addis Ababa.

The right of self-determination, a basic principle of the League, does not imply a right to backward countries to remain unprogressive. The League Covenant contemplates international assistance to these states and has adopted two methods of affording such co-operation. First is the system of mandates. According to Article 22 mandates are divided into three classes. Mandate A relates to communities which can be trained to self-government; Mandate B to the administration of colonies taken over by the Allies from the vanquished forces in the last War; and Mandate C to sparsely-populated territories which are to be administered as part of the territory of the mandatory. The Ethiopian Empire, already a self-governing unit, falls under none of these categories. The only method by which the League can assist Abyssinia is by advice and help with the consent and co-operation of the Emperor. Its Committee of Five accordingly recommended a Charter of Assistance. The details of the Committee's plan are: Dealing with public services which require organisation, the suggestion is made that commissions of foreign specialists should be appointed to organise a corps of police and gendarmerie responsible for ensuring the application throughout the Empire of the existing order, or future laws for the prohibition of all personal slavery, for regulating the carrying of arms by persons not belonging to the regular army or the police, and gendarmerie forces, for policing centres in which Europeans reside, and maintaining order in frontier territories. Reorganisation of mixed courts, education and public health with a principal advisor placed at the head of each group of public services is suggested. The League has shown partiality for European interests and the provision for special police where Europeans reside is another proof of it. This clause would be unobjectionable if it covered not only Europeans but all nationals. The Committee recommend that the working out of these plans should be reviewed at the end of five years by the League Council. All appointments are subject to the approval of the Emperor and presumably the right of removal from office rests also with the Ethiopian Government. Haile Selassie whose extremely conciliatory attitude has commended itself to all impartial people and who is not averse to utilising foreign talent in developing his country, accepted these proposals even though the Committee Report carried a clause recognising "special Italian interest in the economic development of Ethiopia."

The rejection of these terms by Italy reveals the extent of Signor Mussolini's ambitions in Africa. It is the tragedy of the Duce that he should have failed to realise the strength of League opposition till it was too late. His remark that he had not sent two million Italians to Africa as a joke, is a pathetic protest against belated action on the part of Britain. The lead which Sir Samuel Hoare gave at Geneva early last month, would have been more effective nine months earlier. As it is, it has rallied world opinion to Abyssinia's support. Italy's complete rejection of League intervention is announced in a declaration last week-end hinting at an attempt to settle the dispute outside the League. It is confirmed by the indignation with which the Italian delegate opposed the Committee of Five's recommendation to concede territory in French and British Somaliland to both Abyssinia and Italy, on the ground that Abyssinia would gain by the transaction an outlet to the sea. Baron Aloisi's objection that Ethiopia would thus become a "maritime power," can only be described as proceeding from a desire to keep Abyssinia weak and defenceless at the mercy of Italy. Technically it might be necessary for the League Council still to consider who is the aggressor but Italy stands self-condemned. The League cannot be accused of moral flabbiness as its course in this affair has been beset with difficulties not of its creation. But if the recommendations of the Committee of Five are conceived, as we believe they are, in the interests of Ethiopia and if the guarantee of territorial integrity and unimpaired sovereignty is to mean anything, the League should carry out the recommendations without the co-operation of Italy. That Signor Mussolini should be allowed to dictate the pace and direction of Abyssinian progress is intolerable. One of the clauses of the Mandate section of the League Covenant expressly provides that the Mandatory should be willing to accept the trust. If it is not willing it can not demand that the mandate should be withheld from others. On the analogy of that formula—and it is difficult to justify the Committee of Five's proposals otherwise—Italy's refusal should not prevent the League from carrying out her obligations to Abyssinia. Every indictment of Haile Selassie in the past was a condemnation of the League also. The incidents of the past month have shifted the burden of Abyssinia's progress entirely on League shoulders.

Wrecking and Working:—The Mahratta thinks that it is inconsistent of the Reformer to describe the Hoare Scheme as a car with its tyres punctured and engine removed and at the same time to suggest that people of this view should leave those who believe in the Reforms to work them, giving them such assistance as they can in carrying through reforms which build up the nation's strength and vitality. "Why allow those who are anxious to work the reforms to make an experiment of the whole at the nation's cost and make its life even more miserable than it is or is likely to be," asks the Mahratta. What is the alternative? If the people who are willing to work the reforms, initiate measures which are those which we want carried out, it would be factious to oppose their efforts because they take a more hopeful view of the reforms. A constitution, after all, is a means to an end which is the well-being of the people. The Mahratta says "if we are worthy enough, our working must lead to their (reforms) being wrecked." We do not like the word or the thought of wrecking. Every human action, small or great, has a subjective effect whether it has or not an objective one also. An attempt at wrecking may or may not result in destroying the thing sought to be wrecked but it is sure to give rise in the wrecker's mind to reactions weakening to its capacity for constructive effort.

Women and Moving Pictures:—It was a happy idea of the Bombay Talkies to set apart Wednesday for purdah women to view the film, Jawani-ka-Hawa, which led to some misconceived agitation when it was released some days ago. Devika was present and in a short speech solicited the approval of the large audience to women taking part in moving pictures as an honourable occupation. She said: "I am proud of my profession, and it will be a source of great encouragement to me, if I may feel that you too believe that women should contribute their culture and abilities to this growing industry whose power is spreading from home to home."

During our trip two years ago to Europe and America nothing impressed me and my daughter so much as the great regard in which Gandhiji is held in all countries and by all classes. In Italy, in Vienna, in Geneva we found evidence of this. In the railway journey it was the same. In America there was if anything greater interest and more regard felt for Gandhiji. The newspapers constantly wrote about him. Several books were published about him and, what is more, references to him were to be found in works on History, Politics and Philosophy. Not to mention books by Indian admirers of Gandhiji, there were attempts to understand and interpret him by others, such as Dr. F. D. Fisher's "That Strange Little Brown Man," Mr. Glorney Bolton's "Tragedy of Gandhi," and Mr. C. F. Andrews' books.

More significant still are the references to Gandhiji, in standard works, such as Trotsky's "History of the Russian Revolution," where comparing him with Tolstoy, Trotsky says: "Mahatma Gandhi is now fulfilling the same mission in India, only in a more practical form;" in Stalin's political report for the sixteenth Soviet Party conference, where he says people like Gandhi are supporters of police bayonets and helpers of Tzarism; in Hocking's "Spirit of World Politics" where with Masaryk and Benes, Gandhiji is cited as an example of one man of genius leavening the whole lump of his people and as "the property of every Hindu;" in Upton Close's "Revolt of Asia"; in Louis Fischer's "The Soviets in World Affairs"; in Norman Angell's "The Unseen Assassins" a complementary work to his "Great Illusion" in which several pages are devoted to examining Gandhiji's views; in Barbusse's "Thus and Thus" and in Dr. Schweitzer's latest volume in his "Philosophy of Civilization." These are some of the books that occur to me and they are books written in or translated into the English language, except the last one which is reviewed in the Hibbert Journal. The references are complimentary in some and critical in others. It is noteworthy that they are often casual and allusive, implying that the reader has a general idea of his life and work. It would be a good thing if the Bombay Provincial Congress Committee arranges to have all references to Gandhiji, in books published within the last ten or fifteen years in the important languages, collected and compiled.

What is the aspect of Gandhiji's life and work which has attracted the world? It is certainly his principle of Non-violence. The Western world has had bitter experience of the consequence of violence in the last war. All the evils of war feared by Arjuna on the battle-field of Kurukshetra and worse, have been realised. The hope of ending all war which President Wilson cherished, has failed to materialise. The West is eagerly seeking for some means of putting an end to this ever present danger. It might seem that this view is contradicted by what is happening in Europe today but really it is not so. Believers in the sacredness of violence like Signor Mussolini, want to achieve their aggressive aims quickly just because they feel that world opinion is turning against them. It is not too much to say that, intellectually, the Western world is convinced of the futility of violence and has come to believe in non-violence as the only true means of settling national differences. The action of George Lansbury and some other Labour leaders in England, who recently objected to the British Labour Party supporting the use of force even against Italy, is a sign of the times. There can be no more crucial case where violence would seem to justify itself than against Italy in her designs against Abyssinia. Still these men who are fully convinced that Italy is doing wrong feel that violence is not the best way to meet her contemplated crime. I cannot help thinking that this is the most signal proof of the success which Gandhiji's gospel of non-violence has yet produced.

Before going further I should like to say a few words about the implications of non-violence. I believe that Gandhiji himself has recently corrected a common view. Absence of violence where violence is out of the question is not non-violence. When a man or nation is too weak to resist a violent adversary, it is absurd to claim credit for non-violence. Those only can be non-violent who have the strength to be violent if they wanted, but will not use it. From this point of view I consider Dr. Moonje's efforts to instil physical and moral strength into the people as a necessary step towards real non-violence. We must be strong that we may be non-violent. As for Dr. Moonje's advocacy of animal food, I may mention an incident. The late Swami Vivekananda, was once asked by a friend in my presence, whether vegetarianism was essential to spiritual development. The Swami who had just returned from the Congress of Religions in America i. e. forty years ago, burst out: "You grass-eating slaves, eat whatever you like, but be men first." I am myself a vegetarian but I do feel that it is hardly worth while creating a split on the matter of diet in our already much divided country.

The second feature of Gandhiji's method which has attracted world attention is his belief in self-suffering as a means of reforming social evils. We were waiting for our train at Niagara railway station after a long day spent in visiting the Falls, when a small boy who was selling newspapers sidled up to me and asked if I was from India. When I said yes, he asked me if I knew Mahatma Gandhi. When I said yes, again, he asked "Why does he fast? for the freedom of his country?" I replied that he fasted for the freedom of his country as also for the sins of his people. This idea of vicarious sacrifice and suffering is a very ancient one. At first men offered goats, sheep and cows and even human beings as sacrifices to atone for their sins. Then they adopted mortification of themselves as the truer method. The great ascetic orders are founded on this principle. The ascetic is not trying, as the modern critic often thinks, to save only his own dirty soul, but he really believes that his sacrifices and suffering will lead to the salvation of the world. This idea was developed highly and we had Buddha and Jesus as the supreme exemplars of self-sacrifice for the good of humanity. Gandhiji's fasts were unique in that they were directed to the reform of social customs and practices. Several other people since Gandhiji's fasts have tried to apply the same method to other evils. Mr. Sharma at present is fasting unto death at Calcutta in order to put an end to animal sacrifices in the famous Kalighat temple there. Speaking for myself I am inclined to think that self-torture of this kind and for such purposes cannot lead to permanent results though once or twice they may have some apparent and temporary results. However, people who undertake such fasts from such motives are entitled to our respect and gratitude. The gospel of non-violence must be preached with patience and perseverance.

I am not one of those who think that it is an unpractical gospel. Mankind has advanced from the brute stage to its present stage. We have built up the family, the society and the nation on the principle of non-violence. Any one who resorts to violence within these institutions is punished by the state or society. It is only one step forward, though a great step, before the whole human race attains to the same level, and all the different nations regard themselves as members of one another. The almost universal condemnation of Italian aggression on Abyssinia shows that a world conscience is emerging out of the present seeming chaos, cutting across long standing prejudices of race and colour. President Wilson's idea of the League of Nations is a great one. But it cannot be achieved unless and until the world comes to accept the principle of non-violence, as the basic principle of international relations. Disarmament will not end war. Even if all the arms are scrapped people will fight with fists and teeth if they do not accept the principle of non-violence.

Mr. Richard B. Gregg has elaborated this in a book which was published in America last October and is being published in London this month. I received a letter from him this morning saying that he spent five years over it after he went back from India. "It is," he writes, "an attempt to explain in terms of western psychology, military strategy, and political theory, the validity of Mahatma's method of solving conflicts not only in India but everywhere." I mention this here to show that the practicability of non-violence is passing beyond the realm of fervent hope.

Before concluding I should like to make a few observations as to the future. I heartily wish like Mr. Gangadhararao Deshpande that Gandhiji would return to lead the national movement. It is one year almost today since I wrote to Gandhiji about his then contemplated retirement. The letter is dated 29th September 1931. It ran thus:

"I am writing to you with much hesitation. Those who put their hands to the plough in public life can not turn back. You are entitled to a holiday after your strenuous work. But it need not and should not mean retirement. In all great movements the immediate objective is of little consequence. You have influenced many lives far beyond your circle, large as it is. You have raised the tone of public and private life in our country and made her name honoured in all the continents. While younger people must be made to feel their responsibility for the right conduct of public affairs, elders should not renounce their responsibility, so long as life lasts. I am sure you never will."

Gandhiji as usual sent a very kind reply in which he said that he was not retiring from public service and that if he left the Congress he would leave it to serve it better. A day or two later I met one of the most distinguished leaders of the Liberal Party and, talking matters over with him, I asked him point blank, whether, if invited, he would rejoin the Congress, now that the Civil Disobedience was dropped. To my most agreeable surprise he warmly replied, "Certainly I will. Who will not jump at it?" I communicated this to Mahatma Gandhi and quote this sentence from his reply: "Personally I have so many dear friends among them (the Liberals) that I would love to have them rejoin the Congress." Gandhiji's return to the Congress, in my opinion, is necessary in order to consolidate and unify our public life. More than that, the Congress with Gandhiji at its head is a world movement. I have great respect for those who, in his absence, have undertaken the leadership of the movement, especially for Mr. Rajendra Prasad who, in spite of ill-health and the retirement on one ground or another of other prominent leaders, has bravely and worthily maintained the high tradition of the presidential office.

language which it is intended to hit, it proves a most powerful and potent instrument of mischief in the hands of the administrator.

Now, I will read a passage from that judgment of Sir Lawrence Jenkins. Sir, this is what the judge says, "The Advocate-General has admitted, and, I think, very properly, that the pamphlet is not seditious and does not offend against any provision of the Criminal Law of India. But he has contended, and rightly in my opinion, that the provisions of the Press Act extend far beyond the Criminal Law; and he has argued that the burden of proof is cast on the applicant so that, however meritorious the pamphlet may be, still, if the applicant cannot establish the negative the Act requires, his application must fail."

That is precisely what happened to us. We have once had a law which was assumed by many of the members opposite including my Hon'ble friend Sir Zafarullah Khan and that law was the Criminal Law Amendment Act and as that law is there, the present Bill is its logical result. I have not dealt with the two sections of forfeiture because I do not wish to exceed my time limit. If there was logic how did it escape them in 1908.

The judge further says in that judgment: "If the applicant cannot establish the negative, the Act requires his application must fail." And what is the negative? Please hear the negative.

"It is not enough for the applicant to show that the words of the pamphlet are not likely to bring into hatred or contempt any class or section of His Majesty's subjects in British India or that they have not a tendency in fact to bring about that result. But he must go further and show that it is impossible for them to have that tendency either directly or indirectly and whether by way of inference, suggestion, allusion, metaphor or implication." Nor is that all, for we find that the legislature has added to this the all-embracing phrase "or otherwise."

What I wish to point out is this. The language of the section is such that none of us know in what way a man may be caught. It is all very well to say, do not read the section, leave it. It is all very well to speak about some 'Yugantar' or 'The Sandhya,' there is no ratiocination; that is no logic. It is all very well to have the 'Yugantar' at one end and the terrorist at the other end and squeeze all the rest in between for argument. This is the way this case has been argued and I, therefore, do beg of every member of the House; that he will not stand for a piece of legislation that enables the Government to forfeit the security and ultimately the press, with the aid of that all-embracing section which, in the wisdom or unwisdom of Government, it is possible to make an order against and the negative cannot be proved.

Indian Muslims and Persian Reforms:—The latest social and religious reforms enforced by the Persian Government has caused great unrest in the Shia community in India, and several protest meetings have been held in Lucknow recently. It is said that the Persian Government has made it compulsory on all citizens to wear the European hat and shave their beards. Even the religious leaders are forced to put on hats and wear European dress when not performing a religious duty. Further the women have been forced to come out of purdah, and are not allowed to use even the veil. It is also said that certain restrictions have been placed on the observance of religious duties. Hakim Syed Mohammad Ali Shabbir Mohani, who is a respected leader of the Shia community in these provinces, has decided to visit Iran in October next in order to investigate the truth of these rumours. He intends to make a comprehensive tour of the country and to make a thorough investigation so as to inform the Indian Shia community of the true state of affairs.

SOCIAL EVOLUTION.

Social efficiency was always on a par with the soundness of the ethical system on which a particular society is based. Even the worst exploiters could thrive so long and so far as they could exhibit certain qualities which expressed the greatness of their heart. Courage, chivalry, spirit of service, generosity, these are the qualities that were shown by all the conquering races and when they ceased to maintain those qualities and tried to take intellectual advantage of their position, they also ceased to hold their power. Alexander, Cæsar, Napoleon and many other conquerors were successful so far as they were morally fit to hold their own as leaders of humanity against all attractions of selfishness and individual monopoly. But great souls, like Christ, Buddha, Confucius, Mahomed and Socrates, survive for ever as the eternal inspirers of virtue and goodness among mankind simply because the works they have done appeal to the heart of man and are of great constructive moral value. Even the prosperity of a particular sect or a family was directly in proportion to the goodness it possessed, the love it showed to its own members, the courageous way in which it undertook new lines of action, the impartiality it had maintained, the truth it spread and so on. And when these qualities were gradually lost, the prosperity also was lost and the very same groups that proved to be extraordinarily efficient have degenerated into cliques of low cunning. This was true with all great civilizations that visited this earth. Such was the fate of Roman and Greek civilisations, the Brahmin civilisation in India, Cæsarism in general; all lived and flourished according to their ability to be good and, when they betrayed any sign of moral weakness, the bulk of humanity refused to give them any shelter.

This sort of religious altruism is not a mere feature of human life but an evolving movement which is the true cause of the progress of mankind. It is this movement that abolished slavery and had written poor laws. It is this movement that compelled the worst tyrant to give concessions and yield to the very people on whom he perpetrated many an inhuman crime. It is this movement that had produced the greatest rebels who fought for the rights of mankind, the prophets and poets. It is this movement that had introduced the democratic element in the world's life and ever demonstrated the equality of man. It is this movement that is inviting day by day greater number of people into the rivalry of life, giving scope to greater number of brains, more discoveries, research on a wider scale and true intellectual and spiritual progress. In the actual struggle for life, intellect no doubt is the deciding factor of success but the true force that gave scope to and enlarged the territory of that struggle is the democratic religious spirit. It is this movement of the human heart that proved always to be an effective check over the diplomatic individualist brain. The use of intellect was allowed so far as it served the society; so far as it unearthed new treasures for its use, discovered new fields of action and new methods of stability and well-being. But so soon as it leaned towards tyranny or exploitation, it was overpowered by the rebellious heart of man. And ultimately it is the marching movement of this human heart that is offering us a promise that one day it would absorb all the activities of the intellect and establish true social equality among mankind.

All the phenomena of religions are in a sense rebellions against exploitation. Referring to one superhuman power they set limits to the limiting-refusing activities of the individual. The fear of man ceased to exist in the fear of God and the same fear became an uniting link between people of different ranks and different parts. Divine virtues have become the ideals of life and everyone felt proud in practicing them at any cost. Practical utilities were hated to a large extent and it became a general understanding among all people that mundane powers would not lead them very far. The bitter experiences of life gave room for ample philosophy and a longing for emancipation from this worldly thralldom. From this philosophy grew philanthropy and all humanitarian and social reform movements. Those who hate the progress and happiness of all in their own interest are as rare as villains. All agree theoretically and try their best to put into practice the golden rule that we should not hurt another life in any way and that, on the other hand, we should help it as far as possible. Even the worst enemy feels for his opponent in distress. And we must admit that love is the sheet-anchor of life. Governments maintained order and law, but the force that gave birth to fellow-feeling and good relationship in society is the inherent religious instinct in man.

But so far, that altruistic religious movement was on the defensive and its activities were negative. It was awake when the call came and offered enough soldiers to fight out its cause. In all fields, political, economic as well as religious, it had left enough warnings in the records of history so that the greedy might be on their guard. At the same time, unfortunately, it encouraged some sort of negative asceticism which was always inclined to ignore society and its material as well as intellectual needs. Many sensitive and capable persons who could have done much for society if they had remained in it, who could have, if they so willed, moulded the environment according to their selfless dreams, have in a fit of negative religious enthusiasm, disappeared into the solitude of their own individual freedom. The ultimate result of all this was, while most of the people have restricted their activities to their immediate necessities, the unscrupulous few who had crossed the limits and refused to obey the ethical mandates of the heart have become abnormally affluent and turning back they began to utilise the innocent and ignorant masses for their own selfish ends. They maintained flatterers to make propaganda for them and priests to write religious sanctions. Both in times of peace and war they came to the front and dictated terms which were advantageous to them. They built factories for they brought them more wealth. They bought fame and leadership as they gave them standing, credit and advertisement for their avocations. They could purchase impunity, and all luxuries are a divine right to them. Courtiers and weak-minded women gathered round them and sang slogans which went to attest their rights of exploitation. To them reform is a menace and the talk of freedom to the oppressed youth is a dread, for they instinctively know that canons of freedom are definitely inimical to the regulations of exploitation. And the patronage they command from the politician and the priest is apparently certain—at least so long as the kind of economic system prevalent today continues to exist.

But below the surface, the slow process by which the full life of man is expressing itself is definitely against them. The majority are in favour of the poor and the oppressed, those unfortunate brethren who are consistently excluded from the free competition of life. Day by day, the movement of the heart is gaining ground and permeating into the perverted civilisation of the calculating brain and into the seemingly omnipotent military powers with a force which is of divine origin. The Holy Alliance, the Hague Conferences, and now the League of Nations are all experiments, though negative, to bring about a settlement of peace between nations whose political as well as economic ideologies are diametrically opposite to each other. In the French Revolution history has for the first time noticed that the people themselves are advancing forward and asserting their rights. And the various socialist movements which, not satisfied with mere political equality, are demanding economic, social and spiritual equality, are rising in every nation with the emotion of the reckless youth in their favour—for while the ability to purchase and possess the comforts of life is limited to a few, the freedom to have them conferred by political democracies is a delusion which is misleading and perilous. Various armies of peace, the Theosophical and Red Cross Societies, and such other humanitarian institutions are trying to bring about a universal spirit of service and understanding between peoples of different traditions and training. The sages of the East and the prophets of the West, the great bards who sang for the freedom of Man, the great artists and philosophers, have all been engaged in releasing the undermined universal spirit in every individual soul and making propaganda for the ideal of complete social emancipation which is the very purpose of the nature in man. It is through this process in the beautiful words of Shelley, that

Conquest is dragged captive through the deep;
Love, from its awful throne of patient power
In the wise heart, from the last giddy hour
Of dead endurance, from the slippery, steep
And narrow verge of drag-like agony springs
And folds over the world its healing wings

But it is in Gandhi that this religious movement which was so long influencing the political and economic life of the various peoples indirectly and pressing for a change of heart in every field, has come into direct conflict with the realities of life, with methods of non-violence which are of universal application. Stimulating the masses for eternal action, this great man is striving to develop a consciousness in them which is invincible. At the same time he wants to bring into the fold of the society even its oppressors who went out of it with selfish interest.

THE LATE Mr. R. FOULKES.

By the demise of Mr. Robert Foulkes, the District of Madura has been deprived of an illustrious citizen who, for over a decade, controlled the civic destinies of the place. Mr. Foulkes was born and educated in England, but came out at a very early age to India and was employed in superintending the estates on the Shevaroyas, of his uncle, the late Mr. Robert Fischer. The fact that at a very early age he was thrown in Indian society gave him rare opportunities of understanding the people amongst whom he lived, and throughout his life, he commanded a popularity among Indians which is rarely the lot of European residents in this country. He was the President of the District Board of Madura for several terms, being repeatedly elected, sometimes unanimously, by the members who are practically all Indians. In fact, it must be stated that there is hardly a parallel in the whole of India, where a European has been returned to an honourable and important post like the Presidentship of a District Board by his Indian colleagues. He was a nominated member of the local Legislative Council, and took a keen interest in the affairs of the District with which he was connected so long. His death at the comparatively early age of 62 will be deplored by his many friends, Indian and European, in this Province.

CUSTOM, STATUS AND INFLUENCE.

Mr. P. J. Griffiths, District Magistrate of Midnapore, led a debate in the Delhi Arya Samaj Hall on the proposition that women in the West are happier than their sisters in the East. 'Sisters', I may mention parenthetically, is here used in the widest sense and refers in no way to European women in India. It is worth mentioning that the proposition was lost and that neither Mr. Griffiths nor Mr. Bhulabhai Desai who opposed him, nor Sir Phiroze Sethna who presided, spoke relevant to the subject. The general feeling seems to have been that happiness was a personal matter and that there was much to be said on both sides. Mr. Griffiths was most interesting because he drew most from his personal experience. He expressed surprise that on landing in Bombay he saw so few women in the streets. Having read Otto Rothfeld's lyrical outburst on seeing Indian women in Bombay—"they pass here, brightly-clad, quietly smiling, modestly distant, the women of India at their newest and most modern.....In their cars the wives and children of rich merchants glide through the crowd"—I could not understand at first how Mr. Griffiths had missed seeing them. Then I knew. Mr. Griffiths must have come in by a boat which arrived early in the morning. Early birds though Indian women are, they are too busy to meet the boat at dawn.

Mr. Griffiths seems to have regarded the custom of the wife walking a few paces behind the husband which still prevails among the old-fashioned, as a sign of inferior status. This custom once led some Indian students at a foreign university who felt, no doubt, that such conduct disgraced their country, to manoeuvre an Indian guest into making way for his wife. More awkward for the poor woman than for her husband who must have felt at the most that his hosts were ill-mannered boys! The practice, it is interesting to note, is one of many which brings the extreme wings of the ultra-fashionable and the old-fashioned together. For I have often noticed a tendency in my Indian friends who have married European wives and are presumably devoted to them, behave in public parks and on strolls as if they had nothing to do with them. One particular gentleman, I remember, insisted on strolling a little ahead airily whistling a tune while his wife and I brought up the rear. I was first under the impression that this was the prevalent manners of the smartest society in Europe. It was only later that I found he disliked the public curiosity which attends on any Indian walking out with a foreigner.

But too much might conceivably be made of the order of precedence adopted in an evening stroll and many a modern young man who gets his wife walk alongside of him, treats her with less consideration than older fashioned husbands. Yoshio Markino, a Japanese artist who admired Englishwomen immensely, comments with his usual shrewdness on another Oriental habit which has brought Eastern men into trouble with Europeans, that of allowing the lady carry burdens. "I remember," he writes, "my brother's home life. He used to take his wife and myself to our neighbouring village. Of course his wife had to carry the bundles and follow after him. That was our custom. But when we came to lonely field then my brother always looked round very carefully, and would say to his wife, 'I am so glad nobody is looking at us; give me that bundle immediately.' And he carried the heavy burden himself. But no sooner did any people appear above the horizon than he would shout to her, 'Be quick, take this burden yourself.' When we returned to our house, he always asked his wife if she was tired and he never forgot to express his sympathy toward her." That was in 1912. The East was anxious to justify its ways to the West. Mr. John Langdon-Davies related in a publication a couple of years ago a defence of the custom which he had from a woman. "A husband," he writes, "was reproached for his failure to assist his wife who carried pots and food on her head and the younger baby on her hip. The woman came to his defence, saying, 'What would I do if we met a lion and my husband were carrying a load?' " I hasten to assure Indian husbands that this danger need not be feared; a precaution necessary in a jungle becomes an intolerable nuisance in a city. But this assurance is hardly needed since women have realised that the modern man might safely be utilised to carry the burden. Even this, however, is not free from reproach. A favourite joke with English humorous journals, I have long observed, is the husband who follows tamely behind staggering under a load of purchases, while his wife marches from shop to shop with portly nonchalance. Nor is it safe to engage a coolie to carry your bundles, apart from the expense, since your friends might censure you for capitalist leanings. The only solution is that husband and wife should avoid going out together.

For one who regarded India as a land without women—apart from his first experience in Bombay, Mr. Griffiths said that the one thing which struck him when he visited Indian friends was the absence of their wives—Mr. Griffiths has found out very much about Indian women. "In respect of breadth of interest, Western women had a great advantage over Eastern women." I should have thought that this drawback was related to a corresponding defect in Indian men and that both arose from lack of opportunity more than from lack of interest. The English woman in India has all the advantages of her sister who remains in England plus experience of this country. Yet they have no noticeable breadth of interest. Rather the reverse. Indian women have criticised them for a narrow outlook on life. Further, the women, and for that matter the men, one meets at tea-parties, either in the East or West, are not, generally speaking, notable for breadth of interest. Even if one is fortunate enough to meet breadth of interest and outlook at social functions, one dare not enter into a lengthy discussion, for example, on the finer points of Proust, the ethics of Marxian Communism, or even the Italo-Abyssinian dispute. There are, moreover, some quite well-known individuals who think that few women have an interest in anything except persons. Mr. Griffiths will be interested to hear from Mr. C. E. M. Joad, in whom the philosopher and the amorist combine to an alarming degree, complaints of a comparative absence in women of external objective interests. And Mr. Joad, if we are to believe what he writes, has met women not only at formal functions.

It was further claimed by Mr. Griffiths that Englishwomen had more independence while it was possible that Indian women had more influence in the family. He was wise in reducing the issue to one between English and Indian. After all East and West are comparative terms. America regards Britain socially as as backward as Britain regards Asia. An American woman, Mrs. F. P. O'Connor, explained the lack of independence in Englishwomen which she had observed in a pithy sentence. "The American man expects to make his wife happy; the Englishman expects his wife to make him happy"—a summing up which admirably expresses Mr. Griffiths' own view of the contrast between England and India. Richard Burton whose readiness to generalise on every possible subject has made him little known today except as the translator of the Arabian Nights, enters on the different treatment meted out to women in Eastern and Western societies with enthusiasm. The centre of his argument, however, is that the Eastern adopts the instinctive, the Western prefers the rational method—a convenient formula which Professor Nitobe with Japanese acumen has rendered for mass consumption in the words, "American husbands kiss their wives in public and beat them in private; Japanese husbands beat theirs in public and kiss them in private." The attractive phrase notwithstanding, all these arguments fail because they are based on a wrong premise. Women, it is generally thought, are what their men make them. Nothing could be farther from the truth. The question of precedence in walking, freedom from carrying bundles and other similar concessions to the male have helped to maintain an illusion. But where O'Flaherty sits is the head of the table. Woman has always been the dominant factor in society. Man left to himself follows the line of least resistance. After all, it was Eve who sickened of the lotus-eating life of Eden. Man's role in society has been that of a figurehead—something like Sir Henry Craik's "dummy editor" of seditious newspapers.

VIPRA.

PRAYAG ARDH KUMBHA MELA 1936.

The six-yearly Prayag Ardh Kumbha Parva falls in January next. The Mela will last for over a month and the chief bathing days will be January 8 (Lunar Eclipse), January 14 (Sankranti), January 24 (Amavas) and January 28 (Vasant Panchmi). It will come to a close with a bath on Maghi Purnima, the 7th February. Prayag being the Tirtharaj (the king of sacred places) owing to the confluence of the holy rivers, the Ganga, the Jamna and the invisible Saraswati, has, from time immemorial, attracted lakhs of pilgrims from all parts of India.

It will be easily realised that special arrangements will have to be made to cope with the large influx of such pilgrims. The district authorities and the railway administration will no doubt do their part of the duty and take such measures as may be suited to the occasion, but even when they have done their best, non-official agencies will find a large field of work open to them.

In view of this the Seva Samiti which has considerable experience of religious fairs proposes to organise a volunteer corps to help the pilgrims who will visit holy Prayag. The volunteers will help them in bathing at the ghats with the maximum of comfort, purchasing railway tickets, and getting into the proper trains at various stations in Allahabad and near it. They will render first aid to those that get hurt and restore waifs and strays to their relations or send them back to their homes. The Samiti will also make arrangements for the distribution of medicines and the provision of medical assistance for sick pilgrims. Its volunteers will co-operate with the authorities in matters connected with public health and the regulation of traffic. The experience of the services rendered by them on the occasion of the Hardwar Kumbha of 1927, the Prayag Kumbha of 1930, and the Hardwar Ardh Kumbha of 1933 should be fresh in the minds of the public. No service is too difficult or small for them and the volunteers are ever ready to give help.

To perform the duties enumerated above we shall require the active and enthusiastic co-operation of about 1,000 volunteers and we have no doubt that young men and women will eagerly come forward, either individually or in groups, to help the poor and the helpless on the occasion.

The boarding and lodging of the volunteers, the provision of medical assistance, the relief given to poor pilgrims and waifs and strays, the cost of printing, postage and telegrams and expenditure on the establishment and equipment will amount to about Rs. 15,000/-. Considering the number of volunteers, the duration of the work which may extend to 5 weeks, and the assistance which it is proposed to render to the pilgrims, this sum is by no means large. We hope that our appeal will meet with a large-hearted response from the public. The success of our mission depends entirely on the financial support that we may receive from our generous countrymen. The opportunity for public service at Allahabad will be great and the need for it urgent. It is in the hope that the response to this call of charity and service will be as whole-hearted as it should be immediate, that this appeal is made.

All remittances should be addressed to the Organising Secretary, the Seva Samiti, Central Head Office, 1 Katra Road, Allahabad, U. P.

SWARAJ AND RESPONSIBLE GOVERNMENT.

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

In your editorial of the 17th August you say: "There is no inherent connexion between Swaraj and representative, responsible government.....It is, perhaps, inevitable that Swaraj for British India should take the form familiar to the British people. But there is no reason why Indian States should also be put in the same uniform. Swaraj to our mind only requires that the political centre of gravity of a people should remain within it and not outside. At what point within the people it stands at a given moment, depends on the political and social, including the economic ideas actuating the people."

There is a significant passage in a letter to the "Times" by Professor R. Coupland, Beit Professor of Colonial History in the University of Oxford, and reprinted by him as a "Postscript on the Meaning of Dominion Status" in his recent book, "The Empire in These Days," which provides interesting reading in the light of your remarks.

After quoting the well-known sentence in which the fact of equality of national status was affirmed by the Imperial Conference of 1926, and which defined the Dominions and Great Britain as "autonomous communities within the British Empire, equal in status, in no way subordinate one to another in any aspect of their domestic or external affairs, though united by a common allegiance to the Crown, and freely associated as members of the British Commonwealth of Nations," Professor Coupland says:—

"Lastly, it may be useful to correct a mistake which is commonly made both in this country and in India. Dominion status in principle has nothing to do with the form or type of internal constitution in a Dominion. It is only concerned with the external position. It is a matter, so to speak, of the 'international' relations between the nations of the Commonwealth. It fixes that relationship as one of equality. It may be hard to imagine the Commonwealth as anything but an association of States under parliamentary government; but Dominion Status does not require a Dominion's internal constitution to be parliamentary. A Dominion might enjoy Dominion Status under any domestic regime, provided (1) that it maintained allegiance to the Crown; (2) that it contained no element of subordination to any other member of the Commonwealth; and (3) that it accepted free association with the other member."

[Swara] is not Dominion status and we did not use that meaning Dominion status. Professor Coupland's view that Dominion status refers only to external relations and may exist without responsible, representative Government, is contrary to all authorities. It is inconceivable that Hyderabad or Mysore, for instance, can be a Dominion. Newfoundland when it gave up representative, responsible Government, surrendered its Dominion status.—Ed., I. S. R.]

GANDHIJI ON CONVERSIONS.

My own detached view may be stated in a few words. I believe that there is no such thing as conversion from one faith to another in the accepted sense of term. It is a highly personal matter for the individual and his God. I may not have any design upon my neighbour as to his faith which I must honour even as I honour my own. For I regard all the great religions of the world as true, at any rate, for the people professing them as mine is true for me. Having reverently studied the scriptures of the world, I have no difficulty in perceiving the beauties in all of them. I could no more think of asking a Christian or a Mussalman or a Parsi or a Jew to change his faith than I would think of changing my own. This makes me no more oblivious of the limitations of the professors of those faiths, than it makes me of the grave limitations of the professors of mine. And seeing that it takes all my resources in trying to bring my practice to the level of my faith and in preaching the same to my co-religionists, I do not dream of preaching to the followers of other faiths. 'Judge not lest ye be judged' is a sound maxim for one's conduct. It is a conviction daily growing upon me that the great and rich Christian missions will render true service to India, if they can persuade themselves to confine their activities to humanitarian service without the ulterior motive of converting India or at least her unsophisticated villagers to Christianity, and destroying their social superstructure which, notwithstanding its many defects, has stood now from time immemorial the onslaughts upon it from within and from without. Whether they—the missionaries—and we wish it or not, what is true in the Hindu faith will abide, what is untrue will fall to pieces. Every living faith must have within itself the power of rejuvenation if it is to live.—Harjan, September 28.

NOTES

Animal Sacrifices at Kalighat:—Ramchandra Sarma, who undertook a fast as a protest against animal sacrifices at the Kalighat Temple from which Calcutta derives its name, was persuaded by Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya to suspend it for one year during which period the Pandit himself undertook to work for the abolition of this cruel, inhuman and un-Hindu practice. The Vedic religion like the Hebrew religion ordained animal sacrifices. At about the same period, the sixth century before Christ, the prophets in Judea and Gautama Buddha in India denounced such sacrifices. Animal sacrifices continued to be offered at the Temple at Jerusalem until its destruction by the Romans in 72 A. D. Jesus Christ surely realised the enormity of offering up innocent animals as a sacrifice to the God of Love in atonement of man's sins but he never attacked institutions holding that the purification of the individual human heart was the most efficacious way of humanising society. It is only thus that we can account for his studied silence in respect of animal sacrifices, slavery and other evils which flourished in his time. The doctrine of ahimsa, however, received general acceptance in India where the ground was prepared by centuries of religious culture and the Sakyamuni's teaching against animal sacrifices was incorporated in post-Buddhist Hinduism. Ramchandra Sarma in his endeavour to stop animal sacrifices in the places where they have survived, has behind him the strongest of Hindu traditions, reinforced by humanitarian world opinion. His work, therefore, must succeed. Outside Calcutta, his protest has met with immediate results and even in Calcutta Hindu conscience has been aroused to this enormity. Pandit Malaviya had taken a vow fifty years ago when he first visited Kalighat never to do so again. He broke his vow to meet Sarma who had been fasting for thirty-two days and to persuade him to suspend the fast offering to take upon himself, old, weak and overwhelmed by public responsibilities, the mission of redeeming Hinduism from the last taint of a cruel custom.

Tagore on Sarma's fast:—Rabindranath Tagore wrote to a friend, who had appealed to him to intercede with Sarma to give up his fast, a moving reply which is published in the Modern Review. The Poet said that he had drafted a letter to Sarma but on second thoughts decided that he was not entitled to advise one who had made the great resolve to stake his life to effect so momentous a reform. "The vow which he has taken," wrote the Poet, "is a vow of supreme self-dedication. We with our weak minds have no right to, are not qualified to, judge of its result either way.....Where is the parallel to this dedication itself? In this case it will not do to think according to our own ordinary standards and ideals. We shall undoubtedly feel anguish at this dedication of his life; but the value of that dedication lies in the anguish that we shall feel in consequence of it.....This gift of his life will remain preserved for ever in our historical treasure house of precious gems."

Are Gonds Hindus?—The Rev. Father Elwin who is doing excellent work amongst the Gonds, has raised the question whether Gonds are Hindus. The question itself involves a misconception. Hinduism is not a creed. It has no dogmas which every Hindu should accept or cease to be a Hindu. It is not wedded to any stage of social evolution. To ask if the Gond is a Hindu, is to make Hinduism, what it is not, a credal affair like the great personal religions. The only reliable test of whether a group like the Gonds is or is not Hindu, is whether it regards itself as Hindu or not. On this point there is no room for doubt about the Gonds. J. F. Hewitt, who was Commissioner at Chota Nagpur in the early sixties of the last century, in his 'Ruling Races of Pre-Historic Times' gives a mass of information about Gonds based on their own legends. Most interesting of these is that they were descendants of the tribe to which Kaikeyi, mother of Bharata, half brother of Sri Rama, belonged. Maruti or Hanuman, the faithful and devoted messenger of Rama, is the wind god of the Gonds. Bhima, one of the Pandavas, is another reputed ancestor. The five important Gond festivals, Akkhadi, Jivati, Pola, Dibali, and Shimga, have their counterparts among other Hindus and fall at the same time of the year. The priests of the Gonds are a special class of Brahmins. The origin, history and religious ideology of the Gonds is inextricably interwoven with Hindu evolution. J. F. Hewitt was among the first Indologists to emphasize the accuracy of tradition as material for history.

Satyanand Stokes' Daughter's Marriage :— Mr. S. E. Stokes of Philadelphia came to India in 1904 as a Christian Missionary. Seven years later he married a Rajput lady and settled down to live as a farmer in Himalayan village fifty miles from Simla. He later adopted with his family the Hindu religion three years ago (Reformer September 17, 1932). In his book "Satyakama" he has explained at length his interpretation of the Hindu religion. There was some difficulty, however, in him and his family being accepted by the caste to which Mrs. Stokes belonged. The difficulties, however, were recently adjusted as reported in the Reformer (September 21, 1935), at the intervention of a deputation from the Hindu Mahasabha. An Associated Press message from Kotgarh dated October 4, says that Savitri Devi, daughter of Mr. Satyanand (the Hindu name which Mr. Stokes has taken) was married to Thakur Lakshmi Singh of Delan in the same district, according to orthodox Sanatanist custom in the locality on the 29th September; the ceremony was performed by Pandit Govind Dutt, the family Purohit and Pandit Harishchandra Sastry.

The Justice Party Crisis :—The Conference of the Justice Party at Guntur shows that the movement which it represents has ceased to appeal as an idea to the main body of non-Brahmins in the Madras Presidency. The Conference decided to collect a crore of rupees and to have paid organisers to strengthen the Party against the next elections. The value of money alone to sustain a political party is limited. Mr. Lloyd George is said to have a fund of some millions at his absolute disposal for political work but his section of the Liberal Party consists at present of himself and his son and daughter. If this is the case in England where money-power counts for much it is not less so in this country where the western idea that duty is what is profitable to do, that 'the stern daughter of the voice of god' is she who filleth our mouths with good things, has not as yet permeated to the masses. The Justice Party has so long managed to do very well without a crore fund. It has virtually monopolised power under diarchy and has broken, according to a friendly journal, the selfish monopoly of the Brahmin. Its sweeping defeat at the last general elections for the Legislative Assembly was not due to lack of the sinews of war. It had behind it for the election not only rich Zemindars but also the richer Chettiers. The Chettiers are no longer with the Party. They distrust it more than they distrust Brahmins. Few Zemindars are rich enough to find the crore without the help of the Chettiers. The employment of paid organisers is another sign of the decadence of Party. One unpaid propagandist carries more weight than ten paid ones. More than that, the introduction of paid organisers will drive unpaid ones out of the field for fear of being regarded as mercenaries. Moreover, people naturally ask why, if one man is to be subsidised for carrying the flag, another would shoulder the burden for nothing. There is a subtler danger still. The paid organiser of the Justice Party may act under the stress of his personal feeling as the unpaid organiser of the opposite party! Taking all things together, we very much doubt if the measures projected at Guntur will save the Justice Party from disaster at the next election whenever it takes place.

The War and the League :—When we wrote last week Italian troops had crossed the Ethiopian frontier and bombarded Adowa from the air but there had been no formal declaration of war. Commencing hostilities without declaring war, seems to be the modern notion of chivalry. The Ethiopian Emperor, who has throughout been very old-fashioned and punctilious in observing the rules of the game, could not make use of the Italian Hospital in Addis Ababa because technically he was not at war with Italy. The League of Nations, after considerable manouvring, declared unanimously early this week that Italy was the aggressor under the articles of the Covenant. But a new difficulty arose as to what was to follow the declaration. It seems that the sanctions prescribed did not follow automatically on the declaration as it was believed all along. A unanimous resolution of the Assembly was required to bring the sanctions into operation. This was prevented by Austria and Hungary voting against them on the ironical ground of the ancient friendship between them and Italy. After the fall of Adowa and one or two other places of minor importance, complete silence has descended on the scene. Signor Mussolini is rumoured to be willing to negotiate with Britain and France on the basis of the 1903 Treaty to which Ethiopia was not a party, but this is no longer possible. Public feeling in India has been growing in strength and volume. The Bombay Provincial Congress Committee has convened a meeting of citizens on Saturday to protest against Italian aggression on Ethiopia.

The British National Anthem at Cinemas :—In the Reformer of August 3, we called attention to the incongruity of striking up 'God Save the King' at the end of cinema shows which not infrequently depict scenes which, to say the least, are unassailable with a pious intention. The New Statesman quotes the following letter from the London Evening Post :—"Local cinemas do at times put up some high class shows, almost worthy of being followed by the usual few bars of the National Anthem."

Sometimes, it's not for me to say how often, some very questionable sex stuff is exhibited that by no manner of means should have the quasi-blessing of the National Anthem played within one hundred miles of it. Is it not time that this incongruous cheapening of an anthem which is still sacred to millions is divorced from money making in any shape or form, before the time and words are bereft of all their ancient meaning? Yours truly, God, King and Mammon." The practice is still more objectionable in this country where an Indian woman who failed to stand up to hear this incongruous performance, was reported in the papers a few months ago to have been slapped in the face by a European in the fervour of drink and loyalty.

Mr. Desai's Adoption Bill:—The Bombay Legislative Council rejected by a large majority on Wednesday the Bill introduced by Mr. Hanumant Rao Desai to overrule the recent decision of the Privy Council extending the power of adoption possessed by Hindu widows. Our learned contributor, Mr. S. S. Patkar, shows in his article which we publish today that the Privy Council's decision is perfectly in accord with injunction of the Hindu shastras. Government came down from their neutral attitude and opposed the Bill on grounds some of which seem to be of doubtful validity. We agree with the Home Member that as far as property is concerned the Privy Council decision would not make much practical difference. But it certainly enhances the status of the widow in a joint family and ensures more considerate treatment to her since she will have the right of adopting a son without the consent of coparceners. Mr. Desai in his letter published in the Reformer (July 27) assured us that he had explained his Bill to Mrs. Desai and that she approved of it. But the Legislative Council was not so easily convinced by his reasoning and threw it out by a rather contemptuous majority. The result is wholly due to the determination of Bombay and Poona women not to lose the ground conceded to them by the Privy Council, usually one of the most conservative tribunals in the world.

Wedgwood Benn on the New Constitution:—The important article in the current Political Quarterly by Mr. Wedgwood Benn, Secretary of State for India in the second Labour Government, deserves more attention than it has received here. He tells us how the Labour Government tried to redeem the consequences of the mistake of Lord Birkenhead in making the Simon Commission an all-White body. Notwithstanding difficulties, it succeeded; and Lord Irwin was able to persuade the National Congress to send delegates to the second Round Table Conference. While Gandhiji, the sole Congress representative, was yet on the high seas, the Labour Government was succeeded by the National Government in Britain. In view of the criticism that the reactionary features in the new constitution are the consequence of Congress extravagances, it is interesting to note what Mr. Wedgwood Benn says of them. He writes:

"In the negotiations for the new constitution the spirit of co-operation was gradually abandoned. India dropped out of the picture. In the new Bill the emphasis was altered even if the technical terms remained the same. There was no mention of Dominion Status at all. There was no attempt to pretend that the safeguards were 'in the interests of India' as stated in the Delhi Pact. Worst of all, direct election, which hitherto has been the rule in India, was abandoned and it was decided that the Central Legislature should be chosen indirectly by the Provincial Assemblies. This provision combined with the extreme conservative character of the Central Assembly and the creation of Second Chambers in the provinces effectively prevented any hope of a popular and, therefore, strong Central Government." Mr. Wedgwood Benn points out that one condition on which the Simon Commission laid stress, namely, that the new constitution should, as far as possible, contain within itself provision for its own development, is violated by the retention of the pre-amble to the 1919 Act making Parliament the judge of when and what changes should be made.

Working the Reforms:—"Will India work the Constitution," asks Mr. Benn. He answers: "Working the Constitution may mean two things. It may mean merely a willingness to stand for election but its real meaning is a willingness to form or support an Indian Ministry. That Indians will be found to accept portfolios of course goes without saying. Moreover a very large section of the Central Legislature will be nominated by the Princes and will dutifully discharge its function. Moslems will no doubt co-operate in British India. But what of the authentic representatives of the Hindus who form the majority of the population?" Having regard to their enormous stake in the country, Hindus will no doubt try to secure through the Princes and the Moslems what they cannot through their own authentic representatives. They will in doing so lay themselves open to charges similar to those which the writer in the Round Table lays against them, of intriguing with the Princes and encouraging the Ahrar-Quadiani quarrels. That cannot be helped. Mr. Benn expects that the demand for a change in the Indian constitution will be immediate. "It is to be assumed," he writes, "that so long as a National or Conservative Government exists it will remain unanswered, at any rate for some years. In any such period of delay the relations between Britain and India can only suffer deterioration. The economic condition of the masses is hardly likely to improve. Above all strong vested interests will have been built up on the strength of British pledges. The task confronting the inevitable remodelling of the new constitution will be a formidable one." The average British politician will, no doubt, say that we shall cross that bridge when we come to it. Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof.

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Oct. 12]

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

BOMBAY, October 12, 1935.

THE ROUND TABLE AND INDIA.

The September number of the British quarterly review, the Round Table, is its one-hundredth number and opens with an editorial headed "Twenty-five Years." When what took shape as the Montagu-Chelmsford reforms was on the anvil, this writer had a long conversation with Mr. Lionel Curtis, one of the moving spirits of the group whose organ it was, at Bishop Palmer's House on Malabar Hill. The Bishop left us together and did not make his appearance until we had come to the end of our talk. The end was thuswise. Mr. Curtis explained his plan at length and it struck this writer, and he said so to Mr. Curtis, that it was so cut and dried and provided for all possible and impossible future contingencies that, in the Round Tablers' world, there was left no room for the working of Divine Providence. Mr. Curtis was evidently unprepared for the criticism. "If that is how you take it," he said, shrugged his shoulders, and did not finish the sentence. We both rose. The Bishop came on the scene at this point and smilingly invited us to tea. In the "Twenty-five Years," credit is taken for the idea of diarchy which was the central feature of the Montagu scheme. That diarchy has proved a complete failure and has been discarded without a word of regret in the Hoare Scheme, is very slightly acknowledged in the editorial. The Round Table, it is said, "was closely associated with the device of diarchy, which seemed for the time being (italics ours) the most practical method of preventing the perpetuation of an irremovable executive confronting an irresponsible legislature." At that time, the Round Table advocated diarchy as an infallible device of unlimited validity. Pragmatism of this sort in a swiftly changing world, is apt to recoil on itself. As a fact, diarchy was a failure almost from the first except in one province where the lion and the lamb lay together, but the lamb inside the lion! In its plan for India, the Round Table group committed the same mistake as Sir Samuel Hoare and his Round Tablers. They totally forgot the people most concerned, the Indian people. A mild reminder that the destinies of the Indian people may not be wholly left to the direction of the Round Tablers, irritated Mr. Lionel Curtis and brought our conversation to an abrupt but, we trust, not unfriendly end. With the aim of the Round Table to discuss without party bias the great issues of the day, we have complete sympathy. That, too, is our own aim. We are glad that the Round Table will henceforth extend its scope to international affairs instead of confining it as hitherto mainly to inter-Empire affairs.

In its section on India, the Round Table this month includes an interlude on "Congress and the States," which we reprint on another page.

The consultation of the Congress Parliamentary leader, Mr. Bhulabhai Desai, by some Princes on the clauses relating to them in the Government of India Bill (now Act), has aroused the suspicion of the writer. "Mr. Desai is an able lawyer," he observes, "but there are many able lawyers in India without pronounced Congress or indeed any political associations. If the States deliberately choose a man of his political commitments as their adviser, it would justify a conclusion that they were at least inclined to preserve a Congress connection." It is the misfortune of the Princes that they are suspected of ulterior motives in whatever they do. When Sir Leslie Scott was engaged by them in the beginning of the present reform discussions, they were suspected to have selected him because of his intimacy with the late Lord Birkenhead, then Secretary of State for India. The Round Table writer suspects them of having an ulterior motive in consulting Mr. Bhulabhai Desai because of the latter's close association with the Congress. Mr. Desai, on the other hand, was strongly criticised in the nationalist Indian Press for the opinion which he gave on the clauses relating to the Princes in the Bill. The Round Table writer makes out that the Indian Press failed to understand the inner significance of Mr. Desai's advice suggesting insistence on changes in the clauses which detracted from the position of the Princes as absolute rulers of their States. The writer sums up Mr. Desai's "probable thesis" as follows: "There is no foreign domination in the States. Therefore keep them strong. If they are now assimilated, to what will they be assimilated? To British India in which for a long time to come His Majesty's Government in some form or other will retain a powerful say. In this theory, the States may be the location of the most effective resistance to and subversion of British authority in India." This, says the writer, is identical with Gandhiji's view. The statement which he quotes as Gandhiji's, however, does not bear out his identification. Gandhiji thought that interference of the Congress with the States will damage the cause of the people in the States. (Italics ours). The Round Table writer understands him to mean that it would damage the cause of the Congress in British India. The writer's warning "Put not your trust in Princes" shows in what estimate he holds the loud professions of the sponsors of the Hoare Reforms, that they automatically lead to Swaraj.

The writer brings out an important consequence of the introduction of provincial autonomy before Federation and limited responsibility at the centre, which has escaped attention in many of the criticisms published in this country. "There is a not uncommon impression," he writes, "that constitutional development in India will resolve itself into (1) a period of provincial autonomy with a centre operating much on the present lines; (2) after the minimum of States' accession, the inception of federation. Actually, from the inception of provincial autonomy, the central government will have been fundamentally and irrevocably altered, and the essential changes of the federal stage (with the exception of the States' presence) are bound to operate immediately at the centre." This position, it was acknowledged, was fraught with danger, and Sir Samuel Hoare pledged himself and the British Government "that the whole problem will be considered anew if it was likely to continue beyond a brief transitory stage. There is nothing in the Act, however, to prevent this situation lasting indefinitely. The States have twenty years to make up their minds and a whole generation may pass with autonomy in the provinces and a weakened and irresponsible executive at the centre. The writer in the Round Table, referring to the last minute introduction of direct election for the Upper Chamber while the Lower House is to be elected indirectly by provincial legislatures, observes: "Judged by pure political theory the system is topsy-turvy, but there is a good deal in the new political system in India which might incur the same condemnation." Sir Samuel Hoare and his supporters in Britain and in India, however, profess to despise theory. They hold that topsy-turvydom is what is best suited to the conditions of this country and will work best here. Theory to them is of no use in practical affairs. But theory is the light of accumulated experience which helps the reformer to avoid the mistakes of the past and to steer straight to his goal.

FARAGO ON ABYSSINIA.

Mr. Ladislav Farago, a Hungarian journalist, has recently published a flippant book on "Abyssinia on the eve." Mr. Farago thinks very poorly of the Ethiopians. His opinion of the Emperor would sound sinister in a more responsible writer. "He looks tired," writes Mr. Farago, "and is obviously tormented by the recent difficulties of a political situation which he alone understands and the hopelessness of a war. He wants above all rest.....Perhaps he dreams sometimes of a rich carefree ex-Emperor who lives in an atmosphere of respect and peace, being addressed as 'Your Majesty' by distinguished hotel proprietors, and sitting in the seat of honour at international tennis competitions among white people who do not want to get anything out of him." Combined with a supercilious attitude towards non-European races, Mr. Farago has a trait in him which does not exactly enhance his importance as a journalist. The following incident illustrates this. He describes a visit to the court painter, Agegnhou Ingida, and the passage below represents in his own words Mr. Farago's reactions to the hospitality of Ingida who asked his wife to join them. "She was a typical Amharic beauty," writes our Hungarian journalist. "She was the most beautiful woman that I met in Abyssinia. I looked at her for a long time, perhaps too long, taking in her almond-shaped eyes, her well-formed forehead, and the exquisite curve of her mouth, but although she dropped her head shyly, she snatched her chances to return my stare. The loose shama-like dress that she wore over her blouse and skirt concealed her figure entirely. I wanted to see all the natural beauty of this Abyssinian woman, so I asked Ingida if I might see his wife without clothes. I realised at once that my request might appear tactless but the artist in him understood that it was not only this particular woman that interested me but her type, and without a moment's hesitation he told his wife to undress. She hesitated which is very unusual, for Abyssinian wives obey their husbands blindly, however unreasonable their commands, and they must not stop to reflect for an instant. But for some reason or other this woman did not want to do as her husband wanted....I felt uncomfortable but the artist would not give in and upbraided his wife until she declared herself ready to expose herself down to the waist, but she made one proviso, she did not want to stand naked but to show me how an Abyssinian woman does her washing, etc., etc., etc." and we are given a photograph to bear out the truth of this incident. The poor Abyssinian woman obviously had formed her own opinion of Mr. Ladislav Farago—an opinion justified entirely by his own account of his behaviour but very different from that of her unsophisticated husband. It is possible, but highly improbable, that Mr. Farago shows the same manners in European society. It is this person, we believe, whose services have been secured as war correspondent by The Times of India which seems already to regret the acquisition. For while Monday's report from this correspondent is presented prominently as "a message from the actual seat of war in North Abyssinia," a 'Current Topic' in the same issue discounts the report with the sentence, "Our war correspondent is 'somewhere in North Abyssinia' in the region of Gondar. So far as is known conflict, apart from Italian air action, has not yet opened in that particular region."

Caste among Untouchables:—It is the peculiarity of the caste system that the lower we descend in the social scale, the stricter becomes caste discipline. The Mangs are very near the bottom of the caste ladder. A woman of this caste, Ganga of a village in Aurangabad, became a convert to Islam and married a Mohammedan Bhulan, in the Hyderabad State, reports the Secunderabad correspondent of the Evening News. She was ex-communicated by her caste. This was not all. Her son, Rama, could not get a girl of his caste to marry him because of his mother's apostasy. The young man asked his mother to leave the village expecting no doubt that the caste would let her if she were not present in that place. She refused and the son murdered her. He was tried and sentenced to imprisonment for life by the Hyderabad High Court.

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Oct. 12

A PRE-WAR OUTLOOK ON WORLD EVENTS.

It was recently reported that Rome was perturbed at the solid opposition of Indian public opinion to Italian aggression in Abyssinia in spite of propaganda for the Italian case. The recent Labour demonstration in Bombay against which the Italian Consul felt it necessary to seek police protection, shows that that feeling has permeated every class on India. The Indian press has taken a strong line in the Italo-Abyssinian dispute and the Anglo-Indian press with one exception has been consistent in protesting against Mussolini's colonial ambitions. That exception is the Times of India. Very often the Anglo-Indian press assumes a special responsibility for educating Indian opinion on European affairs and many readers who regard its comments on Indian events as prejudiced, are prepared to base their foreign opinions on its editorials. A preliminary article in the Times told the public that Italy must have a railway through Abyssinia linking Eritrea and Italian Somaliland since the alternative was a railway running through French and British colonies in Africa; and that Italy's economic and population needs necessitated the provision of an outlet for her. The argument apparently did not convince even the writer because in a few days, early last June, the Times wrote once more, in support of Abyssinia. Within a week another editorial appeared apparently sympathetic to Italy, questioning the principle of self-determination and generally discounting the League of Nations as an organisation founded on inadequate realisation of international realities. Three days later yet another article was thought necessary to bridge the gulf between these two views, and that advocated international intervention in Abyssinia. Thus all possible attitudes on the Italo-Abyssinian dispute had found refuge in the hospitable editorial columns of the Times. By the end of June the Times more or less adopted a policy. It supported Italy so long as only Italy and Abyssinia were involved; when the League came in, it supported the League but also desired that negotiation should achieve the substance of Italian needs without hurt to Italian dignity. Then came Sir Samuel Hoare's speech giving a definite lead to British opinion and the Times was not slow to take it. And lastly the realisation that the conflict necessarily involved more than Italy, Abyssinia and the League, increased its enthusiasm for League intervention but not to the point of armed resistance to Italian breach of the Covenant. While the Times was laboriously working up to this point of view, its London correspondent held consistently to a pro-Mussolini policy. Priding himself on his realism—really one should rather call it opportunism—he has from the first asked the Great Powers to stand by while Italy works her will on Abyssinia. The anxiety which he shows for neutrality and rearmament that Britain might be strong enough to defend her own interests, almost suggests that he believes with the Fascists that Britain is played out as a colonial empire and that Italy will step into her place.

Under Article Sixteen of the Covenant, even armed assistance to the victim of the aggressor is contemplated. In the recent National Peace Ballot organised by Viscount Cecil in Britain, it was revealed that 94 per cent of those who voted on this issue, favoured economic action against an aggressor nation and 73 per cent favoured military action. In the face of these figures it is a complete misrepresentation of British opinion to say, as the Times of India London correspondent does, that the "great body of middle opinion which the Government will have to face" abhor the use of sanctions in any form. The Archbishop of Canterbury's strong condemnation of Italy cabled to India on Wednesday, will be a hard fact for the middle-opinionist to swallow. This "middle body of opinion" which British supporters of the Government's India policy did to death when they met with determined opposition from every Indian party, is being used now to influence the Government on an international issue. There is no reason to think that it will succeed today, any more than it did on the Indian question, in leading people to think that the writer represents anyone but himself. The "great body of middle opinion," as most people have learnt by now, is utilised to bolster up an unpopular point of view when its advocate has not the courage to stand by it publicly. The Times correspondent's support of Italian aggression on the ground that "so long as Abyssinia controls a very large force of warriors, under a single despotic head, there is no security for the Italian colonies of Eritrea and Somaliland" lays bare the uncritical attitude of the writer to Italian propaganda. This very argument can be used with greater force to justify an invasion of Italy by her European neighbours. His contention that, in the event of Italy being involved in European troubles Abyssinia would attack Eritrea, is pointless as a justification of Italian aggression when it is recalled that Eritrea is an integral part of Abyssinia and, as we suggested some months back, should be surrendered to that kingdom. The writer's remarks on establishing an Italian mandate over Abyssinia disclose a mind which still thinks in terms of old world imperialism. He does not seem to understand the elements of the League of Nations system of mandates. While it assumes the inferiority of colonial peoples, it imposes the duty on the mandatory of educating them to sovereignty. It is the highest absurdity to suggest that the League should deprive one of its members of independence and then ask another member to educate it to sovereignty. It requires a degree of cynicism in international politics which, we are glad to say, did not exist even in pre-League days. We are told by this London correspondent that international control has failed in Tangiers. As a realist can he seriously maintain that the mandate system has met with greater success?

HINDU WIDOWS' RIGHT OF ADOPTION.

In my article in the 'Hindu Law Quarterly' on "the conflict between Mitakshara and Mayukha," I incidentally referred to the decision of the Privy Council in Bhimabai vs. Gurunathgowda (L. R. 60 I. A. 25) which is sought to be overruled by the bill proposed by Mr. Desai. With all respect to their Lordships of the Privy Council, I ventured to offer my criticism on the decision in Bhimabai's case principally on two grounds, (1) that the construction put on the Mayukha in the case of Rakhmabai vs. Radhabai (5 B. H. C. R. A. C. 181) was not quite correct and (2) on the ground of stare decisis as the decision in Ramji vs. Ghamau (6 Bom. 498) overruled by the Privy Council held the field for nearly 50 years. During the course of the said article which was long before the initiation of any legislature on the subject, I stated at page 23 that enlightened public opinion in Hindu society may not approve of the attempt made to deprive the widow in a joint family of the power of adoption conferred by the Privy Council by having recourse to legislature in order to override the effect of the decision of the Privy Council, but on the other hand the condition of the widow in a joint family will be considerably ameliorated if legislation is resorted to in order to give the widow in a joint family also the right to partition the share of her husband in the joint family in addition to the right of adoption.

The criterions for testing the soundness of the decision of a court of law are not necessarily the same as those for considering the desirability of any proposed legislation to set aside the decision of the High Court of appeal. The decision of the Privy Council can be set aside by legislation only if it is opposed to authority and reason.

The decision of the Privy Council in Bhimabai vs. Gurnathgowda is based principally on the decision in Rakhmabai vs. Radhabai, and on the two treatises of Hindu law, Vyavahar Mayukha and Sanskara Kaustubha. It may be conceded that the construction put upon the Mayukha in Rakhmabai's case was not quite correct though there is difference of opinion as to the correct inference to be drawn from the passage in Vyavahar Mayukha Ch. IV pl. 17 & 18. There is no distinction made in the Mayukha between adoption by a widow in a joint family and by the widow of a separated or sole surviving member of the joint family, and it is undisputed that the latter can adopt without the consent of the kinsmen, but it is urged that the former cannot do so. It would therefore be more in consonance with reason to hold that the opinion of the Mayukha on this point is only recommendatory and not mandatory.

As I have stated on another occasion it is very difficult to say whether any particular interpretation of a text of Hindu law can be regarded as infallible.

The law of adoption on this point is based on the text of Vasistha vis. "A woman should neither give nor receive a son except with her husband's permission." All the schools accept the above text as authoritative but curiously enough they have put contradictory and inconsistent interpretations on one and the same basic text. The Mithila school lays down that the permission of the husband must be given at the time of adoption and therefore the widow cannot adopt at all whether with or without the consent of the kinsmen. The Bengal school interprets the text as requiring express permission given by the husband in his lifetime but capable of taking effect after his death, so that the widow can adopt only if the husband has given permission in his lifetime, but she cannot adopt without such permission even if she secures the consent of the kinsmen. The Madras school has adopted a very wide construction of the word "husband" or "lord" by treating it as illustrative and signifying guardian of the widow for the time being, so that the consent of the husband's sapindas who are the widow's guardians after her husband's death is sufficient, but she cannot adopt without their consent even if he was separated at the time of his death. With regard to the Bombay school, Mayne in his 'Hindu Law' para 112 says as follows:—"The Mayukha, Kaustubha and other treatises which govern the Maratha school explain the text away by saying that it applies only to an adoption made in the husband's lifetime and is not to be taken to restrict the widow's power to do that which the general law prescribes as beneficial to her husband's soul. The same interpretation is put on the text by the Nambudri Brahmins of the West Coast. The result is that in the case of adoption by the widow, in Mithila no consent is sufficient, in Western India no consent is required, in Bengal and Benares the husband's consent is required, in Southern India the consent either of the husband or of the Sapindas is sufficient." The view of Mr. Mayne that in Western India no consent is required is given effect to in the decision of Rakhmabai's case which is followed by the Privy Council but is held applicable to the adoption by a widow in a separated family and inapplicable to a widow in a joint family by the Full Bench decision in Ramji vs. Ghamau (J. L. R. 6 Bom. 498) overruled now by the Privy Council. There is no distinction made in the Mayukha or any of the texts between a widow of a separated family and a widow in a joint family as to the power of adoption, and therefore there is no adequate ground to make any differentiation between the two classes of widows in respect of their right to take a boy in adoption without the consent of the kinsmen. The Mayukha while commenting on this basic text of Vasistha says that the permission of the husband is only for a woman whose husband is alive, but in the case of a widow it (the adoption) takes place even without it (husband's permission) with the assent of the father and failing him with that of the kinsmen. The author of Mayukha was considering the question whether the permission of the husband was necessary, and stated that the permission was necessary in the case of a woman whose husband was alive but not necessary in the case of a widow, and he recorded the custom of adoption by the widow with the consent of the kinsmen. He was considering the question of the necessity of the husband's permission and not the question of the necessity of the consent of the kinsmen in the absence of that of the husband. He arrived at the conclusion that a widow could adopt without the permission of the husband. I think that the proper interpretation would be that the securing of the consent of the kinsmen referred to by Mayukha is only recommendatory and not mandatory.

The text of Vasistha is to the effect that a woman should neither give nor receive a son except with her husband's permission. It is admitted by all schools that a widow can give her son in adoption without the consent of her husband or that of the kinsmen, but there is conflict of opinion in the several schools as to the power of a widow to take a son in adoption. There is no justification in Vasistha's text to make any differentiation between giving and taking a son in adoption. If the reasoning of Mayukha is adopted, it would be in consonance with reason if the text of Vasistha is restricted to a woman whose husband is alive and is not extended to a widow.

If reference is made to the other texts considered as authoritative in the Bombay Presidency, it would be found that the text of Vasistha is restricted to a woman whose husband is alive and is not made applicable to a widow. Kamalakar the author of Nirnaya Sindhu which was completed in February 1612 A. D., was the cousin and contemporary of Nilkant author of Vyavahar Mayukha composed between 1610 and 1644. Nirnaya Sindhu is quite definite on this point and lays down that the above text of Vasistha is applicable when the husband is living, otherwise there would be a conflict with the saying of Vatsa and Vyas to the effect that "he is to be known as the son given, whom the father or the mother gives." Kamalakar in the Nirnaya Sindhu nowhere says that the assent of the kinsmen is necessary in the case of a widow taking a son in adoption. The next authoritative book, Sanskara Kaustubha by Anant Dev which was compiled in the third quarter of the 17th century, is very emphatic on this point, and lays down that no permission or consent of the kinsmen is necessary in the case of a widow adopting a son without her husband's permission on the ground that in no part of the country is a female's dependence of kinsmen ever allowed by learned men to restrain her in the observance of Nitya and Kamyavratas and that there is no distinction between the Vratas and the adoption of a son. The Privy Council relies on Sanskara Kaustubha as an authority in support of its decision. The latest authoritative text in Dharma Sindhu composed by Kashinath Upadhyaya in 1790 A. D. is to the same effect as that in the Sanskara Kaustubha.

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Oct. 12

It would therefore follow that the decision of the Privy Council in Bhimabai's case is not opposed to authority, but on the other hand is supported by Sanskara Kaustubha, Nirnaya Sindu and Dharma Sindu. Though the interpretation put on Mayukha in Rakhmabai's case relied on by the Privy Council is not quite accurate, the statement of Mayukha that adoption by a widow in the absence of the permission of the husband takes place with the consent of the kinsmen, is indicative of its recommendatory and not mandatory character and is an argument in favour of restricting Vasistha's text to a woman whose husband is alive and in favour of a widow's power of adoption in the absence of her husband's permission.

S. S. PATKAR

GANDHISM AND SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT.

Gandhism is a philosophy of life and life as a whole. A reason that insists on the sanction of the heart, a religion and self-sacrifice bereft of negative asceticism and self-immolation, a practicality and pragmatism devoid of selfishness and predominance of the aggressive individual over the affairs of the society, it aspires to bring in all the pariahs of the society, who were suppressed and removed from the open rivalry of existence, at the same time, checking the ambition to possess and be greedy. It aims at a well-organised and perfectly disciplined society with a view to introduce the highest form of spiritual freedom into the actual life of man. In such a society there is absolutely no room for a predisposition to material things nor for the stagnation of the intellectual and spiritual powers of the man. The freedom it would realise, would be purely socialist, a common factor of enjoyment between all the members of the human family.

Is it practicable? Can such a society ever come into existence? It is the nature of things, in the nature of human life, that such a state of human organisation should come into being. The demand of the average man for the guarantee of the necessities of life and leisure for intellectual growth, is ever pressing itself forward and has become the chief problem of the modern day. The utopias of life are self-assertive, they are being translated into actualities every day, even without our knowledge. It is the process of social evolution that we should one day live as one society, as members of the same family, like brothers and sisters. It is the depth of our very nature that we should rebel against any form of individual oppression and press for equality everywhere; that we should cross the realities of the present towards the idealities of the future, which could not be charmed away by the form that was presented by the oppressing vice but ever aspired for the acquisition of the substance of joy of both the class and realisation.

Freedom is not a fetishness. It is not a particular achievement—the defeat of a particular enemy or the removal of a particular pest. It is the positive advance of the society towards a greater and a more comprehensive happiness. This is the ideal we are instinctively cherishing day in and day out; and realising the ideal is idealising the real, a constructive process by which we reshape ourselves into a newer world and a newer environment.

The spirit with which Gandhiji introduced the principles of morality in the field of politics and economics, the methods of non-violence he preached for the realisation of human freedom mark a definite change in the life of man and foretell a complete and organised control of his over all the environmental resources. In this new move of life the various legal systems which are always prone to preserve and protect customs already prevalent without questioning their intrinsic worth will soon give place to ethical systems which would aim at the perfection of individual as well as social conduct. The statecraft and machiavellian diplomacy would become unnecessary and out of date and an indiscriminating science of social organisation would take their place. New blood would be pumped into the brain-cells of religion so that it may become more active, giving impetus to the moral and spiritual predispositions in every living soul, at the same time moving the energies of man with equal force, towards environmental freedom.

Superiority of race or caste, however prosperous it might have been in the past, Mahatma Gandhi refuses to acknowledge, thus revealing and demonstrating the basic truth lying under the process of social evolution that all the differences amongst races are apparent, incidental, traditional and environmental and not inherent; and that all the different peoples are being gradually brought to one standard of efficiency, the inferiorities are being abolished and deficiencies removed, simultaneously revealing to the superficially superior races the false ground on which they stand and restricting their exploitations and egoisms to a lesser and lesser circle till they are totally exterminated. By extreme suffering and selfless and heroic undertakings he brought home the fact that certain people and certain nations are enjoying the benefits of the toiling masses of the world by diplomacy, application of certain tricks and military feats, and that so soon as truth and frankness are introduced into public life, exploitation automatically ceases to exist. To drive away deficiency from the poor and apathy from the rich is to create a common interest for the society and a common willingness to contribute their mite to its all-round progress. The deceptive conceit nourished by distance has been killed to a great extent in conflict of cultures and in the intermingling of races. Behind the colours the climate has painted on our skins, we all share the same affections, the same feelings, same emotions and the same necessities of existence. Traditions are the product of imitation, the aping by one generation of the habit of the older one. They are only skin-deep. They can be changed and they are being changed. And we have realised that unless we have one common schooling from our very cradle, one common understanding and outlook, there can be no real peace in the world, still less freedom.

The methods of active resistance or the active non-violence which can be utilised by the unarmed masses for positively marching over all the inimical movements of the selfish monopolisers are the richest contribution ever made to humanity in which lies the promise of a future which may reveal one day a kingdom of heaven on earth. This is a weapon which can be wielded by the masses and masses alone, and the oppressors cannot come anywhere near it. While violence is a method adopted mainly for keeping a mass of people eternally under subjection, non-violence is a means for the unarmed masses to break that subjection and become free. At a time when military imperialism has ended in the abdication of the Kaiser; when Fascism as the last phase of imperialism is oscillating between capitalism and socialism, on the one hand, and between the helpless peace suggestions of the League and war suggestions of its secluded nationalism, on the other; and when communism, failing to spread itself into an international movement, has limited itself as a domestic affair of a single country; the gift brought to us by this divine man, the gift of organised, active mass non-violence, is in itself a hope and a promise that we shall, in the near future, be able to build up a world-state purely by constructive methods, without waiting for the political and intellectual adjustments between European nations which would ultimately end in adjustments and adjustments only. HINDUSTAN ASSOCIATION OF AMERICA.

The Hindustan Association of America has been in existence for nearly two decades in this country and under severe handicaps, doing really useful work among the Indian community. It is a non-political organization, primarily interested in bringing about a cultural understanding between India and America and to open up educational facilities for Indian students here. Due to the very nature of its organization it brings within its fold Indians of all creeds, castes, and provinces. Its associate membership includes people from all parts of the world. No Indian who comes to America and no American or other national who is interested in India, escape its benignant advice, encouragement and guidance.

Every year it has a clear-cut schedule of programmes in cognizance with its organization. Its monthly meetings, where Indian food is exclusively served, are attended by Indians and Americans and always have a guest speaker or speakers of eminence who talk about events of interest to India or about India. In the galaxy of such speakers are included such well-known names very dear to India, like Rabindranath Tagore, Jagadish Chandra Bose, Sarojini Naidu, K. T. Paul, Madeline Slade, John Haynes Holmes, William Kilpatrick, K. Natarajan, S. Radhakrishnan, etc. During the summer of every year, in keeping with the traditions of American institutions of higher learning, it gives a series of courses on Indian culture and this is always well attended. Another annual feature is its "India Night" when an Indian play or dance recital is given. It supplies information about American educational facilities to Indian students. Its various other activities embrace quite a range, the summum bonum of which is to be of usefulness to India and to keep the flag of the mother country flying aloft in distant America.

Appropriately the headquarters of the Association is at International House, New York City, which is the hostel for foreign students studying in the universities and colleges in New York. In this House practically every nationality is represented. The Director of the House, Mr. Harry Edmonds, is an honorary member of the Association and is actively interested in it, as well as the other members of the staff of International House. Their active and sympathetic co-operation and help our Association deeply appreciates.

For some time the Association was publishing a Journal called "The Hindustan Student," which has been temporarily suspended, due to the general exigencies of the time and particularly the depression which cut off our resources to a large extent. We are trying our best to revive it since an organ of our opinion, however humble it might be, is a necessity here.

The Association has always tried to be self-reliant. It has never appealed for funds from home. As a matter of fact it has tried to contribute its mite to needy and deserving causes at home, the last being the Quetta Earthquake Relief Fund. It hopes to continue to follow this policy in the future.

The Indian community here owes a deep debt of gratitude to the American friends of our Association.

Their sympathetic, thoughtful guidance and help have been an inspiration to us.

This summer at International House, New York, we conducted a course of lectures which was well attended by the summer session students from all over the United States and other parts of the world, studying in the Colleges and Universities of New York. The lectures were as follows:

(1) July 11, Thursday, 8-15 P. M. "Beautiful India" by Mr. N. S. Sen, M. A. (Calcutta) representative of the State Railways of India in the United States.

This was an illustrated travelogue lecture on the historical and scenic sights of India. An exhibition of India's artcraft formed part of this talk.

(2) July 18, Thursday, 8-15 P. M. "Opportunities for American Education and Industry in India of To-day" by Dr. V. R. Kokatnur, B. S. (Bombay), M. S. and Ph. D. (Minnesota), Educationist and Scientist, Consultant to Russia on the first Five Year Plan. General manager Sri Shakati Alkali Works, India.

(3) July 26, Friday, 8-15 P. M. "The Art of Hindu Dancing" by Miss Ruth St. Denis, world-famous dancer and interpreter of Hindu Dancing in America.

(4) August 1, Thursday, 8-00 P. M. Hindu Banquet. Guests of Honour Dean J. W. Withers, Ph. D., L. L. D., of New York University and Mrs. Withers. Dean Withers who is an acknowledged leader in the field of education of America of today gave an address on "Some leading characteristics of American Education."

It is hardly necessary for me to say that the United States provides unparalleled opportunities for our students and it is really a pity that few are taking advantage of them. The institutions of higher learning welcome students from India and give them the necessary facilities and help.

Persons from India who are contemplating a visit to the United States are free to write to us for any information they desire and we will be only too glad to be of any service to our countrymen and women. All communications should be addressed to the Secretary of our Association.

INDIAN APPEALS AND THE PRIVY COUNCIL

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

For a century the Privy Council has maintained its prestige and dignity as the best and highest Court of Appeal, incidentally serving as a connecting link between the Colonies and Dominions on the one hand and the Mother-country on the other. Although appeals from abroad cost the litigants concerned a small fortune to fight out their cases at the Privy Council, the British subjects have been loath to break their contact with the Privy Council, as this grand institution has endeared itself to one and all who have had to do with law by its judicial wisdom born of experience, impeccable impartiality and skill and ability to tackle very knotty problems that require not only judicial insight but an abundant stock of patience. The laws they have made from time to time by their calculated and well balanced judgments will go down in the annals of law and history as the soundest juridical expositions that have been ever attempted or made at any age.

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Oct. 12]

But perfect as the Privy Council is, it occurred to me if there is anything that can be suggested with a view to making it even more perfect. The one point that strikes me forcibly is whether the judges ought to read the records of the cases before they hear the cases or if they should come to the Court with an open mind and hear the case as and when it is opened by the Counsel. I am personally for the adoption of the latter course as otherwise there is a possibility of their minds being influenced one way or the other, and they are apt to come to the Court with their minds made up to some extent which the counsel holding the brief for the opposite party will find it difficult to shake off, however convinced he may be about the merits of his own viewpoints. Then again the judge who reads the records beforehand is in a slightly more advantageous position than his colleagues who have not, and his views which have very likely been influenced by the judgments of the Courts below or the records, are bound to predominate during the whole hearing, and this will tend to affect his brothers on the Bench in no small measure which, I am afraid, will not be conducive to the cause of justice. But there can be no objection, of course, to the judges acquainting themselves with the facts of the case beforehand up to a point which is reasonably necessary for the understanding of the case. It also occurs to me if it would not be in the interests of justice for the President not to express his views in the course of the hearing too vehemently one way or the other on any point raised before the Judicial Committee so that his colleagues who have yet to make up their minds, can do so in their own way, and whether it would not be advisable if each judge records his findings independently of one another and the greatest common measure of agreement between the judges so arrived at shall be the determining factor in the ultimate decision of the case.

Will it not also be a step in the right direction that all cases that come up to Privy Council are decided by a Bench of five and not as is more often the case by a Bench of three? The litigant stakes his "all" when he submits his case to the Privy Council and is often reduced to an utter state of penury. As the Privy Council is his last and only ray of hope, it is only fair that his case is disposed of in the most efficient way possible and I certainly think that a decision by five judges is preferable to a decision by three judges.

The above suggestions that I have made in respect of the Privy Council can with equal force apply to procedure in the House of Lords and all courts with appellate jurisdictions in England or India.

BIRTH CONTROL AND MR. BOLE'S PROPOSAL.

The Editor,
The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

This Birth Control International Centre welcomes your support for the resolution on Birth Control clinics to be proposed by Rao Bahadur S. K. Bole to the Bombay Legislative Council. Action similar to that proposed in the resolution has been permissible in England since 1930 for women "where further pregnancy would be detrimental to health."

More than 150 Health authorities have availed themselves of their powers and are now helping women not only to save their lives but to space out their children in accordance with their own health. As this service is carried out by medical practitioners there has not been even a suggestion that anything but good has followed.

The death rate of India being about 26 is more than double that of England which is 12 while the infant death rate is 70 in England and about 160 in India. Preventive health work and Maternity and Child Welfare services can bring the Indian figures as low as the English figures but only if birth control is taught and practised.

We congratulate Rao Bahadur S. K. Bole and wish him every success in his endeavour to help poor mothers.

Yours etc.,

NATIONAL SOCIALISM AND THE CATHOLIC CHURCH.

(Contributed.)

The fundamental relationship between the Party-State and the Roman Catholic Church is being discussed with renewed vigour in Germany today. A certain amount of tension has been evident among the Germany Catholics recently although this has nothing whatever to do with Church practice but is better described as 'atmospherics'. Resulting developments serve to throw a light on the Catholic Church problem in the Third Reich. The expression "political Catholicism" is often used by State authorities in this connection. As stated in the Party programme the National Socialist State is ready to guarantee every Christian Church absolute freedom in religious matters but on the other hand it demands that the Church shall observe unconditional and unlimited abstention from all questions related directly or indirectly to politics or not of purely ecclesiastical nature. The first problem which presents itself is where does religion end and where do politics begin? It is largely due to differences of opinion on where the line is to be drawn that the present friction has grown up. But unimportant excesses of subordinates on both sides should not lead people to suppose that a great cultural struggle is going on. There are a number of problems to be settled between the National Socialist Government and the Catholic Church but no very intimate knowledge of German domestic conditions is necessary to make it evident that a "Kulturkampf" is not being waged. In spite of their disagreement neither party desires an open war to break out. Bitter remarks are made on both sides but both the State and the Church readily admit that their disputes have nothing to do with the fundamental question of whether cordial relations can possibly exist between Church and National Socialist State. In this connection both sides agree and it is only a matter of instilling the totally new principle of the Third Reich into the Church and co-ordinating them harmoniously with ecclesiastical tradition.

The Fathers of the German Catholic Church will meet shortly at the Bishops' Conference in Fulda. Presumably new decisions will be made with regard to the negotiations with the State and a new spokesman for the Catholic Church will be appointed to take the place of the Bishop of Berlin who is now dead. Bishop Berning of Osnabruck who is a member of the Prussian State Council is said to be likely candidate. The Church seems to think much of Bishop Berning's diplomacy and it is to be hoped that the negotiations with the State about the Concordat will be resumed shortly. It is realized today more clearly than ever that the Reich Concordat signed on July 20, 1933 is the best possible foundation for a proper balance between Church and State as soon as the parties can come to an agreement on the interpretation of the Articles. If the Church and State had not agreed on principle the Concordat would never have been signed but controversy subsequently arose when the theory was to be translated into practice.

One section of the agreement is still no more than theory. Discussions were carried on last year between representatives of the Government and the Catholic Church and a solution was reached on July 29 but this was finally rejected by the Holy See which did not hesitate to overrule the German Catholics. Since then negotiations have been at a standstill and the present strife is partly due to this gap in the Concordat regulations. According to Article 31 the State guarantees not to interfere in "exclusively religious, purely cultural and charitable organizations" under the stipulation that an agreement between Church and State should be forthcoming as to which organizations and associations were to fall under this category.

Discussions will probably be resumed after the Conference in Fulda. A satisfactory solution would be in the interests of both parties. The recent campaign against "political Catholicism" seems to indicate that both State and Party are aiming at reaching a final agreement with the Church on the interpretation of the Concordat in order that religion and political activity in the Church may be unequivocally defined and friction come to an end.

GERMANY'S FINANCIAL POLICY.

Count Schwerin von Krosigk, German Minister of Finance, has published an article in the September number of the "European Review" ("Europäische Revue") dealing with the financial policy of his country, from which we quote the following: "Germany has twice stood over an abyss of economic collapse, and each time it has been possible to set aside the danger, and to turn despair and bankruptcy to hope and new life. The inflation period was overcome by the creation of new currency and by a policy of the most rigid economy. A complete change of financial policy was the only thing that saved Germany from the deflation period. Pockets were empty, there was no capital and trade was at a standstill, and so, in place of non-existent private orders, state orders had to be given. These could be financed only by means of short-term credits. The "attack on the reserves of the future" connected with this policy was the only possible way because these future reserves could only be built up by means of enlivening the nation's trade, which would, in its turn, lead to increased revenues from taxes and the slow building up of new capital, from which, then, the credits used for increasing trade would have to be repaid. Several factors contribute to show that this new financial policy has been successful: the number of unemployed has been reduced from 6,000,000 to 1,700,000, the state revenues have increased by two milliards of Marks, and many other economic figures serve to illustrate the same theme. The Finance Ministry has now to see to it that the upward trend is not disturbed or hindered in anyway. In addition the principal motive of the leaders of the Work Creating policy must be to use the newly created reserves to cover and to fund the credits. This task demands a state policy that will lead to the complete recovery so greatly desired by means of equalising the credits. There must also be a careful control of the prices of commodities. The national socialist government will certainly one day bring the proof that it is master of all the difficult economic problems with which it is faced."

THE FIGHT AGAINST TUBERCULOSIS.

I was one of the early pioneers of the open-air treatment in England. Nearly 38 years ago there was no open-air movement and no Sanatorium existing in England. Then two or three of us young men went over to Germany to study tuberculosis, and, to our astonishment, found that country far ahead in the open-air treatment having established Sanatoria 40 years before.

We returned to England full of hope and determination to make known the new treatment and to open up Sanatoria for the arrest of tuberculosis. The result was that within 35 years the Sanatorium movement spread and became popular all over England. So that when I opened my first Sanatorium in England in 1899 there were only two or three Sanatoria besides mine, now there are 494 institutions in Great Britain for the treatment of tuberculosis.

Looking back on my young stormy days, I feel proud I fought many a battle for the cause of tuberculosis. I was not satisfied with the current opinion of the day on many problems of the disease, and I was not afraid if my observations ran counter to the orthodox beliefs held at that time. Only I wanted to delve beneath the surface, to think independently and to know the truth of things at whatever cost—and cost it did, but I did not mind so long as my institutions and convictions led me into the right path and made me sure of my ground.

I tried to bring a new angle of vision and to persuade my profession to go beyond bacteriology into the new fields of biochemistry, sociology, and electronic concept of disease. I said that man is more important than microbe, and that he alone holds the master-key, and speaks the last word in the causation and cure of disease, that micro-organisms are rather the effect of a cause than the cause themselves, and that man's environment—the air he breathes, the food he eats, the drink he takes, the wages he gets, the house he occupies—these living factors go to determine the conditions of his health or disease. Such a view seemed revolutionary at the time, but now the profession is veering round to accept the truth of this new concept.

I said that the soil is more important than the seed, and that the sure and certain way to prevent and cure tuberculosis is not to try to destroy tubercle bacilli, but to strengthen life's forces, to improve man's soil or constitution and increase his powers of resistance by right living. Now, all the civilised nations are coming to believe this idea and are doing their best to raise the social and economic conditions of their people. In fact, in proportion as they have given attention to improving the social well-being of their people, and promoting their health and prosperity have they reduced the incidence and mortality of tuberculosis.

Again, I said that tuberculosis is more an insufficiency than infectious disease caused by bad social, economic and hygienic conditions, and that given fresh air, good food and healthy and happy surroundings tuberculosis could be conquered in the course of time, but that if the nutrition of the people is poor and their vitality low, the death rate from the disease would increase. This view has also been amply proved to be true in the late war when thousands of Germans and Austrians suffered from starvation and under-feeding, and died of tuberculosis from want of good nourishing food. So much so that Professor Kayserling, one of the foremost authorities on tuberculosis in Germany said:—"German physicians are beginning to say that tuberculosis should be regarded primarily not as an infectious disease, but as a disease of nutrition, to be controlled much more by feeding than by preventing infection." I have said the same thing about India. The main cause of tuberculosis in this country is poverty, underfeeding and malnutrition; next comes insanitation, bad housing and early marriage. The one sure way to prevent the disease is to raise the standard of living of people, improve their sanitation and housing, postpone the age of marriage in both men and women and cheapen such articles of food as milk, fruit etc.

I said that cow's milk does not give tuberculosis to adult human beings. This was a very controversial question years ago. But I proved to the hilt that in oriental countries like India, China, Japan where little or no cow's milk is drunk, tuberculosis is more prevalent than among the European races who drink more milk, and that in England the poor and the working classes who drink very little cow's milk suffer more from tuberculosis (70 per cent of tuberculosis occurs among them) than the well-to-do classes who consume a great deal more. I so convinced my opponents, that among others Dr. Jane Walker veered round to my view.

I said that tuberculin injection will do more harm than good and that it is not wise to inject poison into a patient who is already burdened with poison in his system. A battle royal was fought on this question and I lost many prospective patients at Mendip Hills, but I stood firm in my view and had the satisfaction to see many sanatoria, one by one giving up tuberculin treatment, including the King Edward Sanatorium at Midhurst, Kent.

Referring to conjugal infection, I said there is no evidence that living with tuberculous husbands brings about a greater mortality among their wives, and vice versa. Here again there was much opposition, but I brought arguments and statistics to prove my point, and I was supported in my opinion by men like Dr. Charles Goring, a great American statistician, who after a careful and exhaustive study of the question came to the conclusion that "the correlation of infection of tubercular disease from association in marriage is both negative and insignificant."

Now coming to the treatment of tuberculosis, some of you may know that the burden of all my addresses in India and the burden of my book has been to show that early diagnosis and early treatment offer the most successful results in a large number of cases of tuberculosis. I am glad to see that all the industrial nations who have adopted these measures report a great decline of tuberculosis in their countries. America which stands foremost in carrying out these measures has reduced the death rate from 125 per 1,00,000 to 56.4 per 1,00,000 in 20 years from 1912 to 1932.

Lastly, I advocated as early as 1913 a scheme of home treatment and Garden Colony. The idea is that patients could be treated at home when they live under ideal conditions. For this cause I bought private land adjoining Thambaram Sanatorium where bungalows could be built for relatives of patients who after a short stay in the Sanatorium could go and live with their families in these bungalows. This idea has been taken up in America, and in England in the Papworth Colony with no fear of infection to other inmates. The infection lies in indiscriminate spitting by consumptive patients especially in India, and I sincerely hope that the various municipalities, realising this danger, would take steps to stop this dirty and vile habit.

I have made some important contributions to the cause of tuberculosis, and though some of them are in advance of the time, they received the respectful attention of the tuberculosis specialists—large-hearted and broad-minded men they were—in England—who appreciated the work I have done, admired the courageous way I presented my case, complimented me "wellknown as an authority in tuberculosis," and recommended that the Indian Government should utilise my services (which I regret they did not). Contrast this generous treatment with that accorded by the Madras University who refused to have my book in the library—whereas universities of world-wide fame, such as Oxford and Cambridge were glad to have my book in their libraries. In America, I was surprised to find that in the great university library in 5th Avenue, New York, not only my latest book, but every book I have written since 1910 and before is treasured and kept for the use of students and the public. This is the way India treats her children.

Even in this country during my several visits made at my own expense since 1913, I have done my best to rouse the people and the Government to the danger of allowing tuberculosis to spread over the land, and urged them to build Sanatoria for the early cases of the disease. I am glad to see that in my last days in this country I have done something to stimulate public opinion and the Government in this matter and I am still more glad that the Madras Government, alive to the seriousness of tuberculosis problems, are thinking of launching a big scheme to combat the disease. I wish them every success.

As for my part, seeing the urgency of the tuberculosis problem in India I left my Sanatorium work at Mendip Hills, and came over to this country and built the Sanatorium at Thambaram at the foot of Sanjivi Hills in 1928. So near Madras, it ought to prove a great blessing and a healing and educational centre to many thousands who are suffering from this dreadful disease. I would suggest that the Government without much delay should select some early cases from Temple Gardens and draft them to the pure air of Thambaram Sanatorium where they will have every chance of making a rapid recovery.

THE CONGRESS AND THE STATES.*

An interesting and as yet unelucidated political problem is the attitude of Congress to the States. This was brought into prominence recently by the engagement of the leader of the Congress party in the Assembly, Mr. Bhulabhai Desai, as an adviser to the States. The significance of the choice should not be lost. Mr. Desai is an able lawyer, but there are many able lawyers in India without pronounced Congress or indeed any political associations. If the States deliberately choose a man of his political commitments as their adviser, it would justify a conclusion that they were at least inclined to preserve a Congress connection. One of the errors of British political parties is to look on the Princes as conservative diehards in the British sense. They are not. They are more or less absolute rulers, and if there is anyone who has to be a realist, it is a despot. The Indian Princes are realists; they are playing for their own hand—not unnaturally, since no one else will play for them. They see before themselves and their States a future in which the British element will play a less, and Indian elements—many of them disaffected or lukewarm towards the British connection—a greater part. They and their States are indissolubly connected with India's political future and they would be failing in common sense if they omitted to establish some sort of 'nexus' with forces which seem likely to govern or at least influence the India of the future. To the British conservative might well be recommended in a slightly different sense, Strafford's famous words of three centuries ago, "Put not your trust in Princes."

The actual advice given by Mr. Desai was at first sight surprising and it occasioned much clamour and condemnation in the Liberal and in some of the Congress press. In substance he advised the Princes to stand on their rights; to demand that the Instruments of Accession be called treaties; to protest against the use of such words as "usage or sufferance" in any reference to the origin of the authority of the British Crown in regard to the States; to oppose any reference to State subjects in the new Bill soon to become an Act; to object to the Governor-General's having any power to prevent any menace to peace or tranquility in the States. This advice was elaborated later in an address given to the Mysore Bar Association. Mr. Desai declared that the position of an Indian State, according to international law, was that of a monarchical State, where the ruler was a despot in the Greek sense, the source of all power and authority, whose will was law. In this view only the Prince could represent the State as a unit of the Federation in a strictly legal sense. The Leader of Allahabad considered these opinions so reactionary and in such opposition to the previous position of the leader of the Congress party that it declared:

"We cannot but think that Mr. Desai divided his mind into compartments, political and professional. The memorandum is a sad commentary on the public spirit of its author."

The Servant of India describes Mr. Desai's advice as calculated to "stiffen up the Princes' attitude against the claims of the All-India Federation and to bolster up their truncated sovereignty."

In a way these comments are natural enough, but it is necessary to look deeper if we are to see the rationale of Mr. Desai's attitude. Though pressed from time to time to take up the case of the State subjects as against the Princes, the Congress has always hedged on this issue. Mr. Gandhi himself aroused much comment when he declared that "any attempt on the part of the Congress at interference can only damage the cause of the people in the State I have not lost hope that the Princes will... become real trustees of their people. I do not seek to destroy their status." This almost identically is Mr. Desai's view and presumably the present view of Congress. The demand for the abolition of the Princes and their position is, in Mr. Desai's words, psychologically wrong. His probable thesis might be summed up thus: there is no foreign domination in the States. Therefore keep them strong. If they are now assimilated, to what will they be assimilated? To British India in which for a long time to come His Majesty's Government in some form or other will retain a powerful say. In this theory, the States may be the location of the most effective resistance to and subversion of British authority in India. What will happen to the States after such subversion is achieved is another matter, and the Congress party of those days, under whatever name it passes, will quite possibly be ready to sacrifice them; but at the moment and in the immediate future the States may be a useful tool in the Congress hands. No such theory has ever been expounded by any Congress authority, nor for obvious reasons could such an exposition be expected. It is, however, plausible. One thing is certain: those idealists in the United Kingdom who look upon the Princes as the steadfast bulwarks of the British conservative case have thrust their heads in the sand and lost all power of surveying the future.

NOTES

Gold Exports:—When all other countries are rigidly conserving their gold reserves, the Government of India have followed a policy of laissez faire. Nearly 30 million ounces of gold have been exported since September 1931 when Britain went off the gold standard and more are still going out. Indian opinion has loudly protested against this drain but Government have turned a deaf ear to it. Mr. Tallents, the Finance Secretary, has recently issued a statement in which he tried to show that the export of gold was beneficial to the Indian holders. His argument is that gold which India bought during specified years for 195 crores she has sold for 233 crores of rupees making a profit of 33 crores. Why should England, France and America, have been so foolish as not to see what the Government of India have shrewdly seen, the opportunity of making a profit by selling their gold? Mr. Tallents' reasoning would be valid if the gold-holders in India were mostly speculators. But this is not the case. The gold that is being drained away is collected from people to whom it was a last resource at a time of distress. The so-called profits they are said to have made are all on paper. A sentence in the Foreign Policy Report on "Britain's Economic Recovery," issued last July throws light on the purpose behind the Indian policy of free gold. "By February 1932 the Government (British) was able to take advantage of the returning financial confidence which followed the balancing of the budget, victory of the National Government at the polls, and large repayments of emergency Bank of England borrowings with gold imports from India."

Motherhood of God:—We reprint today excerpts from an interesting article in the Vedanta Kesari headed "The Mother; Her Worship and its Significance," As Dr.

Sunderland pointed out in his article "How We Know God Exists" (Reformer, August 17), India makes a very wide, almost universal, use of the name Mother as well as Father in connection with God. The Mother aspect is, in fact, given precedence over the Father aspect. Wherever the two are mentioned together, it is the Mother first; Parvati Parameshwar, Lakshmi Narayan, Sita Ram. The writer in the Vedanta Kesari thinks that Mother worship is in origin Aryan as distinguished from Semitic. It would be more correct to say, Indo-Aryan. Mother worship certainly originated with the matriarchal Dravidians. Matriarchy has survived only in Malabar, but the mother in the Dravidian south continues to enjoy a higher status than the father. The first verse in the Catechism of the ancient Tamil poet Auvai, which every Tamil child learns first, is "mother and father are the visible manifestation of Deity." Auvai and her illustrious brother, Tiruvalluvar, the author of the Tamil classic, Kural, were of the Pariah caste, but there are no names more venerated in the Tamil land. Reverence of mothers is instinctive to all Indians, but it can not be traced to Vedic sources. It has, nevertheless, taken root in the Hindu religious consciousness and the philosopher, Sankara, concludes a fervent prayer to God as Mother with the affirmation, "A bad son may sometimes be born, but never has there been a bad mother." The casual and even harsh tone in which Jesus refers to his mother jars on the Indian reader of the Gospels more than anything else. That this was not due to Semetic heritage is shown by a footnote in Claude G. Montefiore's article, "What a Jew thinks about Jesus" in the July Hibbert Journal. "To the ordinary Jewish mind," he writes, "Jesus committed a serious offence in putting a mother (of all people) to open and public humiliation."

The "Prabuddha Bharata" on Proselytism:—We reprint in another column the observations of the Prabuddha Bharata, published by the Ramkrishna Mission, Mayavati, with reference to a leading article on "Should Hindus Proselytise" in the Reformer of June 22. They are based on a misconception of our views expressed in that article. The point at issue was not conversion to the Brahmo Samaj, the Arya Samaj, Sikhism or any of the reformed sects of Hinduism but proselytising from religions with an alien background like Christianity or Islam.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

The Hindu Mission at Hoshiarpur had included this among its objects and we suggested that it would be well to give it up. The difference between conversion to a reformed Hindu sect and conversion to Christianity is too obvious to require elucidation. It is that between passing from one room to another in one's own ancestral home and being admitted to a Rescue Home as a social derelict. The founder of the Brahmo Samaj was a strong opponent of proselytising missions, and the establishment of the Brahmo Samaj was itself a means of counteracting the efforts of these missions. Ramakrishna Paramahansa held all religions in reverence but no one has denounced proselytising missions in stronger terms than his immediate disciple, Swami Vivekananda, who also held all religions in equal reverence. Religion is not like a coat or a pair of shoes. It goes deep down into one's spiritual heritage and its vitality as an influence depends a good deal on its being rooted in its native soil.

Betel Chewing and Cancer :—We reprint from the Hindu Organ of Jaffna a special article on a new cancer treatment contributed to its columns by Dr. William J. Jameson who has been in charge for many years of the Green Memorial Hospital at Manipay and has had exceptional opportunities of gauging the incidence and causes of the disease in Jaffna. Dr. Jameson holds that excessive indulgence in betel chewing is primarily responsible for the wide prevalence of oral cancer in Jaffna. The disease is also prevalent in Malabar. The habit of betel chewing is common all over India and even beyond, but the incidence of oral cancer is not so high elsewhere as in Malabar and in Jaffna. Two years ago an article was published in the Lancet tracing the high incidence of the disease in Malabar to the use of lime derived by burning sea shells, while in other parts of the country slaked lime was used, with the betel leaf. It would be interesting to know if the lime used in Jaffna is the same variety as that used in Malabar. The new electric treatment for cancer, especially if taken at an early stage, is said to be a certain cure and Jaffna is soon to have it installed in one of its principal hospitals.

Religious Pretenders :—We publish on another page an article exposing the nefarious practices of pretenders under the cloak of religion. In all ages and countries, there have been such men. They have always been the greatest hindrance to religion. In India especially, they have found a favourable field of exploitation. This is because of the value attached by the people of this country to the religious life. It must also be borne in mind that bogus sadhus will not be able to impose on the people so easily but for the confidence created by many genuine sadhus by their unworldliness and devotion to spiritual things. The attitude of the average man is that no genuine sadhu should suffer because of the wickedness of bogus sadhus. We think it necessary to say this as our contributor's criticisms may otherwise be misunderstood as applying to all or even a large proportion of sadhus.

The Concession-Hunter as Pioneer:—Mr. F. M. Rickett, known in Britain as Master of the Hounds in Berkshire, and in Iraq as the ablest of oil company promoters, sprang to world fame last month as the man who had negotiated a seventy-five years concession with the Ethiopian Emperor to exploit the mineral resources of that State. In the middle of September he was to have delivered a broadcast address but, owing to British Foreign Office intervention, the speech was cancelled. It has, however, been published in the press and is a vigorous defence of his conduct. He criticises the attitude of other Governments to the transaction as amounting to condonation of robbery with violence. Commending the concession-hunter as a pioneer he remarks, "I may be forgiven if I venture to say a word on behalf of this very useful member of society... The man who seeks concessions has usually to go into wild places and among savage peoples to find anything worth having. He is more of a pioneer than even the engineer or miner." Richard Burton in the first Supplemental Volume to his Nights, in a footnote on the imperative nature of the principle of retaliation in Muslim law, gives an interesting instance of the British trader's keenness for obtaining concessions and Eastern recognition of it. "There is a legend in Morocco," he writes, "of an English merchant who was compelled to forfeit tooth for tooth at the instance of an old woman, but a profitable concession gilded the pill."

Bombay's Condemnation of Italian Aggression:—At a crowded meeting of citizens held in Balavatsky Lodge last Saturday with the Mayor of Bombay, Mr. K. F. Nariman, presiding, the following resolution was passed without a single dissentient note:—"This public meeting of the citizens of Bombay expresses its whole-hearted sympathy with Abyssinia in her attempts to maintain her political and economical independence against the unwarranted and unjustifiable imperialistic war of aggression and exploitation, launched by Italy, and further appeals to the Indian commercial community not to render any assistance, directly or indirectly, by supplying war materials or commodities, as may be needed, by Italy in prosecution of the said war, and also calls upon the Indian Labour not to help Italy by recruitment or otherwise. Further, as an expression of India's indignation and protest, this meeting appeals to the citizens in general to start an effective boycott of Italian goods, commodities and manufactures as well as all Italian concerns so as to make the proposed sanctions effective."

Indians in Ethiopia :—Nagjee Jeewandas, a prominent firm of Indian merchants trading in the city of Addis Ababa, have written to a local friend about the condition of Indians

In Abyssinia. The letter, which is dated August 2, 1935 is written in Gujarati and pays a high tribute to the Emperor of Ethiopia whom it describes as the nearest approach to the ancient Indian notions of kingship, writes the Calcutta Correspondent of the Hindu. According to the writer, the Negus can be interviewed by his subjects at all reasonable hours of the day without the intervention of any officer, for explaining their grievances and seeking redress. The latter adds that while His Majesty is solicitous of his people's welfare and does everything in his power to mitigate their troubles, he is equally devoted to his own officers, to lodge a false complaint against whom is to court the Royal displeasure. Indian residents of Abyssinia have always been recipients of particular kindness at the hands of the Negus who looks upon them as his country's guests and therefore deserving of, and entitled to, his country's hospitality. When the Municipality of Addis Ababa in 1932 adopted some measures which particularly harmed Indian traders, the Negus on being approached by Indians had no hesitation in ordering the Municipality to give way to Indian demands. The letter concludes: "We Indians shall look upon ourselves as unfortunate if in the coming struggle the Negus, who has been so friendly to us, is defeated. They say that God, however, favours those who are honest and who look upon other peoples' troubles as their own. If this ancient adage has any truth the Negus should come out victorious in the unholy battle that is being forced upon him by a European Power. Indians here are unanimous in the opinion that the Negus' cause is just and that God should not fail him at this hour of trial. If the Negus is defeated I for one shall lose my faith in God for the cause of the quarrel is mainly racial in character. Ethiopia's defeat is the defeat of all coloured races all over the world including India, China and Japan. Italy is bent upon erasing out of history the story of the Russo-Japanese War."

The League Committee of Five's Report:--With the advent of war in Africa, it seems the height of futility to discuss whether the proposals of the Committee of Five appointed by the League of Nations to settle the Italo-Ethiopian dispute, would have resulted, if Italy had not been uncompromising, in handing over Ethiopia to Mussolini. The best arguments in favour of this pessimistic outlook are to be found in the issues of the New Statesman published before the report was out. Therefore the following comment after the Committee had completed its report, is of added value:-- "The proposals are in effect a comprehensive plan for the supervision of Abyssinia by the League...The door would be opened to foreigners for economic development, and Italy's special claims in this sphere recognised. There is talk of territorial concessions by Abyssinia to Italy compensated by grants to Abyssinia of French and British territory on the Somali coastline. Such a settlement would obviously put Abyssinia in a position of something less than absolute independence. But it would not put her under the Italian yoke, and if honestly carried out should be to her advantage as well as everybody else's." Italy's rejection of the scheme rules out the issue of honesty in execution. The objection put forward to the proposals on the ground that they are designed to facilitate foreigners in taking part in the economic development of the country, ceases to have any weight in view of Haile Selassie's own policy of utilising foreign talent where necessary, in the past. A Foreign Policy Report published before the Committee of Five's Scheme was out, summed up the problem facing the League in these terse sentences, "Should the League sanction a protectorate over Ethiopia administered by Italy and involving Italian military occupation, the fact that Italy would be nominally acting for the League by no means assures the passivity of Ethiopia...Success of Great Britain and France in their efforts to find a formula condoning the imperialism of their Italian rival at the expense of Ethiopia, would eliminate the unwelcome alternative of ceding or internationalising certain of their own colonies. Nevertheless, it may be seriously questioned whether the consequent short-run gains of stronger defence against Nazi Germany and the maintenance of the territorial status quo will outweigh the inevitable blow to the League principle of collective security in the face of armed aggression."

Conversion and Marriage:--It is commonly believed that conversion to Christianity or Islam, in the absence of divorce among Hindus, is a device by which a discontented wife can get out of her marital status, generally with a view to marry a second husband. We did not know, however, that Muslim women also are liable to this contingency. There is freedom of divorce in Muslim law and it is not clear why Muslim wives should adopt this tortuous procedure. We publish in another column the text of a Bill which Syed Ghulam Bhik Nairang has drafted for introduction in the next session of the Legislative Assembly. "There have been," says the Syed, "many instances in which Muslim women are alleged to have changed their religion as the easiest mode of obtaining a divorce." The Bill declares that the conversion of married Muslim woman to a faith other than Islam shall not by itself operate to dissolve her marriage in the absence of any of the grounds which Muslim law recognises as a ground for divorce. The Muslim community, the Syed says, has repeatedly given expression to its supreme dissatisfaction with the view, upheld by Courts, that apostacy by a Muslim woman ipso facto dissolves her marriage. It is degrading religion to make it a convenience for attaining social ends and we are in favour of a general law declaring that apostacy does not relieve persons of their duties and obligations before conversion.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

BOMBAY, October 19, 1935.

HINDUISM AND THE DEPRESSED CLASSES.

B. R. Ambedkar's speech at Nasik, a summary of which is printed elsewhere, would not have come as a surprise to any one who has followed his utterances during the last few years. On the same day as or the day after the Malaviya Conference in Bombay, which endorsed the Poona Pact, he spoke at a meeting at the Servants of India Society in which he expressed much the same views as in the Nasik speech of his personal position in regard to Hinduism. Last year at an entertainment given to him by the Indian Christians of Ahmednagar, he expressed himself similarly and in reply to a request that he should become a Christian and lead the Indian Christian community, he replied that, though he greatly revered Jesus Christ, he could not become a Christian because Indian Christians had not given up caste. Although he was at one time actively interested in the question of admission of the depressed classes into Hindu temples, he has of late declared against it and urged concentration on political and economic issues. The only advance noticeable in the Nasik speech is that Dr. Ambedkar recognized the need of religion and advised his hearers to leave Hinduism and adopt some other religion in which they are assured of equality. Speaking for himself, Dr. Ambedkar said that while he could not help having been born a Hindu he did not intend to die as one.

Untouchability is not the only custom which has to be reformed in Hindu Society. There are others scarcely less urgent and social reformers have been working at them for a whole century. Some who felt like Dr. Ambedkar that Hinduism was past redemption, quitted it without making any fuss and became Christians or Muslims. Hinduism went on its way unperturbed. Reformers set themselves to reform society, and by patience and perseverance, many reforms have been effected which were bitterly opposed by conservative Hindus, more bitterly, indeed, than the removal of untouchability, because those reforms affected the structure of the Hindu family and the conduct of everyday life founded on beliefs deep-rooted in the Hindu mind. The vast majority of caste Hindus are unaffected by untouchability and they are unconcerned about it. The Brahmo Samaj, the Arya Samaj, the Social Reform movement, the Ramkrishna mission of Swami Vivekananda, were all efforts to reform Hindu Society and religion. The Brahmo Samaj makes no distinction of touchable and untouchable and, if it is a religion of equality which Dr. Ambedkar is seeking, the Prarthana Samaj will welcome him with open arms. The Prarthana Samaj founded the Depressed Classes Mission nearly a generation back when Dr. Ambedkar was at school.

The Thiyas of Malabar have, within the last generation, advanced ahead of their caste Hindu neighbours in education and social and economic status, as the result of the labours of one devoted man, Sri Narayana Guru, an account of whose life and mission was published in the Reformer of November 12 and 19, 1932. Though an untouchable, he was held in high esteem and reverence by all castes and creeds, and among his disciples are to be found Brahmins, Nayars, Adi-Dravidas and others. Last year, a Nayar disciple of his was in Bombay and spoke of his Guru to several audiences. He was a Bachelor of Arts and Law of the Madras University but had given up his profession and devoted himself to the mission of his Master. Sri Narayana Guru lived and died a Hindu. He had high regard for other religions but he held that for his people Hindu forms offered the most natural approach to spiritual, which he regarded as the first step to social, regeneration. There are numerous institutions all over Kerala to perpetuate the memory of this saint. A statue of his has been erected in the Jagannath temple at Tellicherry.

This kind of work does not appeal to Dr. Ambedkar. What he wants is some ready made religion and social system into which the depressed classes may enter at once on a level with everybody else. He wants the palm without the dust. Untouchability is a blot on Hindu civilisation. It is impossible to defend it. It is not, however, an essential part of the Hindu religion any more than child marriage, the restraint on the remarriage of widows or even caste. These are institutions which can be changed and have been changed without affecting the vitality of the religion. Every society has its shadow side. A book published two years ago by an anonymous author entitled "Children of the Poor" of life in the slums of New Zealand, the most prosperous of British Dominions, describes incidents which are revolting by comparison even with untouchability in this country. The lowest of the depressed in this country has a status. In the west, he has none. The writer lays particular stress on the number of churches in the locality where the scene is laid. The people who will be least affected by the prospect of Dr. Ambedkar leaving the Hindu fold, are the conservatives. "Why don't you become a Christian and leave us alone?" was a question which used to be hurled at social reformers. They would regard Dr. Ambedkar's exit from their society as the removal of a thorn in their side, and will go their own way. The fact that, though he has been speaking for some years about leaving Hinduism, he has not done so as yet and even now can only say that he will not die a Hindu, shows that there are some compensations in remaining a Hindu which he is loth to forego. The difficulty in the case of the masses of the depressed classes whose faith has remained unaffected by their social disabilities, is bound to be much greater.

WIDOW'S ADOPTION AND HINDU LAW.

If the Privy Council decision in Bhimabai's case is, as I stated last week, not opposed to authority, the next question is whether it is opposed to reason.

It is urged in favour of the bill that the adoption by a widow in a joint family will result in disruption of the joint family, but the joint family system is fast disappearing owing to modern conditions of life. In Bombay a coparcener can sell his share without the consent of his coparceners. The Hindu Gains of Learning Act XXX of 1930 secures to a member of a joint family the gains of learning acquired by him even though the learning might have been acquired with the aid of the joint funds. This legislation which interfered with joint family rights was not opposed with any vehemence probably because it was the male members of the joint family who benefitted by the legislation. Is the decision of the Privy Council to be set aside by the proposed legislation simply because it is likely to benefit females in the joint family in giving them a right of adoption? The shares of other members remain intact and are not likely to be diminished by the adoption. They lose the benefit of augmentation of their shares, and the chance of succession to the self-acquired property of the husband of the widow making the adoption in the joint family in the absence of a testamentary disposition by the husband.

As regards the argument that the adoption by the widow in a joint family will result in bringing a stranger in a joint family and will divest the estate vested in other members of the joint family, reference may be made to the recent Privy Council decision, among others, in Vijayasingji vs. Shivsingji (L. R. 62 I. A. p. 161) where it was held following Amarendra Mansing's case that the power of a widow does not depend upon the question of vesting or divesting an estate. The proposed legislation is likely to override not merely one decision of the Privy Council in Bhimabai's case but will upset the whole trend of the recent decisions of the Privy Council. It would however be within the power of other members of the joint family to induce the husband to forbid an adoption after his death, or the husband himself may, if he is so minded, forbid such an adoption if the right of survivorship of the other male members of the joint family is intended to be safeguarded.

As regards the arguments that the widow in a joint family would not improve her status in the joint family and that she would have eventually to depend on the adopted son, it is clear that if the widow has the right of adoption, she would be treated with respect and consideration by the male members of the joint family. She will be in a position to impose conditions on the adopted son by reserving a life-interest in the self-acquired property of her husband. After the decision of the Privy Council, several instances have occurred in which members of the joint family have made liberal provision for the maintenance of the widow in order to dissuade her from making the adoption. The rights of adoption conferred by the Privy Council on a widow in a joint family will certainly improve her status and rights in the joint family.

As regards the argument advanced in 1879 in Ramji vs. Ghamau's case that the widow is "subject to all the pernicious influences which interested advisers are too apt in India to exert over women possessed of or capable of exercising dominion over property," it might be affirmed without any exaggeration that female education has made rapid strides during the last fifty years and that there is a great awakening among Indian women in general and Hindu women in particular due to several causes including the spread of western education and culture. Franchise to women and reservation of seats to women in the legislatures have now been recognized by the new Government of India Act. Women who were long held back and relegated to a subordinate position in the social order have come by their own, and are now asserting their rights and striving for liberation from the restraints of law and custom to which they are being subjected. It is difficult to say in the present evolution of Hindu society that women are more liable than men to yield to the pernicious influences which interested advisers are apt to exercise.

The decision of the Privy Council is neither opposed to authority or reason, and there is therefore no justification for the initiation of legislation to override the effect of the Privy Council.

In Baroda the Hindu Law has been amended and the widow in a joint family shall hereafter be a coparcener and shall have the right to ask for partition and get her own share determined and separated as any male member of the family, and her share shall be equal to that of a son if there is one, and in the absence of a son she will get the share which her husband would have got if he had been alive at the time of partition. Similar beneficial legislation has been enacted in other Indian States. As I said on another occasion, it is a matter of regret as well as surprise that while the legislatures in British India give the lead to Indian States in matters of legislation relating to other diverse subjects, the legislatures in Indian States have now to give a lead to legislatures in British India in matters relating to removal of legal disabilities of Hindu women.

I might mention that decisions of the Privy Council have upset the law on other points of Hindu law prevalent for a long period, yet no attempt was made to override those decisions of the Privy Council. As an instance I may refer to the adoption of an only son which was held invalid by the Full Bench of the Bombay High Court, but the Privy Council set aside the decision and held that the adoption was valid on the ground that the texts were recommendatory and not mandatory. The decision of the Privy Council was opposed to usage and sentiments of the Hindu community and still no attempt was made to get over that decision of the Privy Council by legislation. The Hindu Gains of Learning Act XXX of 1930 did not meet with any opposition but was hailed with delight in some quarters though it was a blow to the joint family system from a proprietary point of view. The opposition to the Privy Council decision in Bhimabai's case has therefore been attributed in some quarters to the reluctance to concede rights to women, or to undue prepossession in favour of the supposed rights of the male members of the joint family.

There is one more point to which I would like to refer. The Privy Council decision in Bhimabai's case is based on its previous decision in Yadav vs. Namdev which arose in Berar where the Hindu law in the Bombay Presidency is followed. The Hindu law in the Bombay Presidency on the question under consideration is now authoritatively laid down by the Privy Council in Bhimabai's case. The legislation in the Bombay Presidency is provincial and will have no effect outside the Bombay Presidency, and the Courts in Berar will be governed by the Privy Council decision and not by any Act passed by the Bombay Legislature. Similar result would follow if a family in the Bombay Presidency migrates to another province, and in that event the Courts in the other Province will have to follow the Hindu law of this Presidency as laid down by the highest Court of appeal and not by the Act of the Bombay Legislature. Many other complications are likely to arise. I think it would be far better if the learned mover of

THE CULTURAL CRISIS OF TODAY.

We of the younger generation find ourselves today in the midst of a vast upheaval in ideas and events—an upheaval more far-reaching in ideas—the dimensions and consequences of which it is not possible to gauge accurately at this critical moment. The final verdict will have necessarily to be suspended to a later date when perhaps the turbulent currents of today will have settled down into regions where their depth and extent can be charted with more ease. Nevertheless, it is essential to arrive at a proper perspective. We know to our own cost that the twenty and one trends in world history are daily forcing themselves on our attention. And we have to measure our force against them, to analyse their origin and position in our life today in order to arrive at a common understanding in outlining future policies, if not to withstand their combined attack at the present moment.

We spent our school-days in comparative comfort and normality. In spite of the prognostication of some of the gloomy philosophers, the world, it seemed, was gradually settling down to the task of post-war reconstruction. At first this seemed to be a heavy responsibility. But in spite of the slipshod way in which this has been accomplished, it is necessary to emphasise here that the world as a whole rose splendidly to the occasion. The enormous waste in productive power was not only compensated for during the course of a decade, but forces were liberated which far exceeded the most sanguine dreams of those who dared to be optimists. Of course, this raised fresh problems—problems mainly of rationalization and distribution,—problems of an economy dealing with the future as an organic whole; and which, as such, also harboured potentialities of mischief in case the remedy was not timely applied or misapplied. Yet it appeared reasonably sure that the economic background for social stability and world intercourse was being steadily built up. And then came the crash of 1929, and the consequent depression which till yesterday seemed to become a constant bogey.

What fresh currents have been thrown up by the events of the last five years? We have seen how the web of finance has intricately entwined the four corners of the globe, and the possible dangers which such a system involves in the absence of a concerted world control. We have witnessed political upheavals which have reduced China to insignificance and which have raised Japan to a status in which she is likely to be a menace not only to Far-Eastern peace but to world peace as well. We—most of us—have been surprised with a new, if not novel, revolution in Germany which professes to have its own Weltanschauung. We have witnessed a gradual dwindling in the system of collective guarantees as represented by the League of Nations and cognate bodies. It will not be fair to put the blame for these and similar developments on any one country in particular. Perhaps one can reasonably expect them to follow from the economic chaos that simultaneously threatened the world, without taking this as their full explanation. In times of distress it is not wholly unjust, and certainly not unnatural, to safeguard your own interests first.

Necessarily, this complicates the situation. And in that measure it also complicates our task of restating the foundations of social intercourse—the flower of human culture. Inverting for our purposes Bergson's proposition that reflection ultimately leads to a loss of hold on life, we can say that in times of extreme difficulty we are naturally led to ponder over the principles on which all social intercourse is, or is supposed to have been, based. The only test we can apply is to ascertain how far this has been done with sufficient detachment and critical acumen.

Perhaps the main trend in world thought today is a violent reversion in the direction of what may be called "irrationalism." The faith in rational man gradually developed by Locke and Rousseau and implemented by the fathers of the French Revolution was finally perfected in the Economic Man of the Classical Economists of the 19th Century. In politics democratic theory was then slowly establishing itself as the last word in human polity. Critics of these prevailing trends, such as Ruskin and Carlyle, of course, could not be heard in the heyday of prosperity. But as the franchise was successively widened and as the art of electioneering was perfected, it was a matter of sense and statistics to point out what very often swayed public opinion in such matters. And if Graham Wallas was the first to put his finger on the spot, it unloosed forces which in Spengler and the Nazi ideologists masquerade as a scientific philosophy glorifying the so-called irrational elements in man. It would seem then that the pendulum of reaction has reached its other extreme. It is interesting to note, in passing, that this line of thought derives some of its inspiration from the current developments in Philosophy and the Natural Sciences. If the ultimate constituents of the atom defy ordinary logic, what glory must the mystic entity called Man hold in itself?

Nevertheless, it is necessary for us to guard against the opposite mistake. Here, as elsewhere, a proper sense of proportion is a sure sign of practical sanity. The complex of sentiments we organize round objects which we love or hate are indeed composed of a variety of emotions, transitory and abiding, inconsequent and far-reaching in their effects, yet amenable in a greater or less degree to harmonised control. Because at one extreme men run after the Saviour-Hero, and place implicit faith in him, it will be false to treat the impulses which force them to do so as the only abiding elements in social intercourse and those which need to be assiduously developed for a supposed social unity. If anything such a state of affairs implies the necessity to widen the sphere of rational control. The history of the human race would have been far more tragic if it were not so in actual practice.

There is a second doctrine in this connexion which is being increasingly used today, chiefly by the apostles of the "irrational" school of human conduct. It is the doctrine of the efficacy of physical punishment—in all its senses—as a corrective for political and social opinions. It has been raised and glorified in Communist Russia, Fascist Italy, and more recently in Nazi Germany. There is some truth in their assertion. For we all know that the impact of purely physical coercion—beatings, floggings and what not—can often work wonders. Hitler, we hear, has reintroduced some of the mediaeval methods of punishment, such as beheading; and the Nazis do not make a secret of the methods they employ in their concentration camps. This glorification of physical coercion is, in a sense, a corollary of the glorification of purely manual labour, which is a fashion with some of the prophets of the New Age. This doctrine, however, by itself is not enough to convert the whole people. For these nation-wide propaganda is necessary, which to be successful must naturally begin with the rising generation of the country. Hence drills, uniforms, disbed-up text-books, and the whole paraphernalia of Dictatorship.

Intolerance, then, is the key-note of the situation. In a sense, this is the inevitable atmosphere when the battle is between ultimate contending principles such as liberty and authority, individual initiative and centralised control. For the present at least there is no ready solution for the prevailing chaos. Only a radical turn in the events can bring about a comparative freedom of opinion and initiative to the individual. If the thoughtful among the younger generation refuse to be stamped into surrendering their reasoning faculty we can yet win the day. The task that lies before them is the task of "de-barbarisation"—a process perhaps as difficult and tortuous as the word which represents it.

P. S. REGE.

BOGUS SADHUS.

Nothing is a more striking feature of India's socio-religious life than the place and position occupied by Saints—Sadhus who in their picturesquely attractive and almost classically simple robes move about in stummy little-known localities hunting for prey with their counterfeited wisdom. But their nefarious acts are not as little-known as their local habitations and for some time provoked much report in the vernacular Press, and gossip in the public. The time has now come when such Bowas can no longer remain peacefully hedged in their former obscurity and the recent sentences passed by the Sessions Judge at Poona, and the question asked in the Bombay Legislative Council bear full testimony to the growing necessity of restricting legally or semi-legally, the practices of such sadhus who have amassed large fortunes by the exploitation of the ignorant and the superstitious, and spread out what is detestable moral crime. The temple-girls and the malpractices carried on in connection with them in the name of Hindu religion is a subject of the present article.

It is difficult to trace the origin of the Devadasi or temple-girl system, for it shades off into those times, when purely religious sanctions came to be distorted into ignoble practices adopted by the wily priests. The pages of Indian History are full of such things. For a long time the priestly classes enjoyed a certain degree of domination and authority in social life which was used by them to play upon the ignorance and religious-mindedness of the masses, and to reap no small benefit therefrom. This is the time and environment in which lies rooted the erstwhile grand but now withering tree of Hinduism of which true religion and misfaith, superstition and reason are the far-stretching branches.

Today, Devadasis are the women given over to the service of God, who manage to a certain extent the temple property, look over to the cleanliness of the idol and the shrine, and such are the modest duties they have to perform. They come from particular families, and like to style themselves as "devoted to Arts" (Kalawants), are masters in music, vocal and instrumental, but with all these things to their credit, enjoy but little social dignity. The reason why they are so low in public estimation is that they are virtually like prostitutes, not outcast from decent society but dignified in the name of religion.

Linked with the evil of the Devadasi system is the practice of making "Girl offering to Gods." The Sadhus undertake certain contracts—almost on a business basis, a contract to obtain suitable decisions in a court of law, a contract for the birth of a son, a contract to propitiate the evil stars, a contract to secure employment on the fulfilment of which the parties have to donate amounts fixed by mutual agreement. In certain cases when the results to be achieved are rather arduous, girls are offered to the divinity of the temple, who are almost under legal compulsion to attend to the divinity—divinity visible in the persons of the Sadhus whose comforts are most carefully and ungrudgingly looked to. One can unhesitatingly declare such practices as not only gruesome, but as involving a certain assertion, in these days of individual liberty, to dispose of precious human personalities, whether it be a sister or daughter as articles "presentable and marketable."

The circle of the devotees and admirers of the Bowas does not extend to the ignorant and illiterate classes alone, in fact it is much wider and embraces a few representatives of the liberal professions. On one occasion I could make out amidst the burly-burly crowd that loitered about the Sadhu's "gates" a Solicitor, who has given over his daughter for adoption to the holy Seer, and also a Third Class Magistrate who had come to present the saint with an excellent gold watch, which may enable him properly to distribute his time in a business-like manner. It is difficult to say why some people, intelligent and educated as they are, should have such strange fascination almost verging on willing slavery to these Saints.

On another occasion, after much painful struggling and elbowing eager spectators thronging on all sides, I had the good fortune of seeing one of these Bowas who is reputed "to enjoy a very lucrative practice in his profession." That bulky unassuming figure, half-naked half-dressed, deep involved in solemn meditation, a mystic-looking man who shared in common the features of a rustio, was seated on a low stool. A heap lay before him, a heap of ornaments, clothes, fruits and money, almost an emporium of presentable articles. Nothing he would talk, just a murmur broke the silence, and suddenly like one attacked by an epileptic fit he switched away, for Sadhus "must turn their back to all wealth"; meanwhile his adroit assistant rushed to the spot, and made a clean sweep of all the things. This, one can understand is a clever pretence of such Sadhus to show their disinclination towards worldly objects, and when gifts are offered they would run away from those gifts, for the gifts are certain to follow them. Wherever they go foolish crowds running after them unload whatever precious things they may have on their person.

On entering into the Ashram (an abode of the ascetics) one is likely to be struck by the pomp and grandeur of the princely residents. In the centre of the hall stood a stately couch, with cushions of exquisitely embroidered silk, on which His Holiness reclines in the idle hours which formed a major part of his daily routine. The inmates of the house consists mostly of ladies of varying ages—from girls just breaking into womanhood, to the old wrinkled dames, who do the work of spies. It reminded me of the harems of the Moghuls, who free after the fatigue of war dreamt away their precious hours in the luxuries of the harem, where ladies most delicately fanned them, embalmed their heads with sweet scents and pressed gently their tired limbs. So to suggest, the renunciationist attitude of the Saints to life is a thing apart for the sham-heroes who are in the place of public worship today.

The ceremonies in the Muths (Houses of Saints) are as hideous as they are despicable—crude rites of a barbarous age. The familiar one is Lang Puja or organ worship into the details of which one for the sake of decency cannot go. It would be better for the reader to see it himself and then judge the standard of degeneration. His Holiness bursts into different moods. Sometimes he poses like a child and begins to crawl about the floor, asking for milk and honey and then the ladies most affectionately fondle him, cradle him in tender soothing lullabies. He would sometimes wear a sari, put on ornaments and flowers and chat with the ladies as being one of them. Sometimes he would say that he is in actual communion with God, make some vehement indistinct exclamations, and reject whatever food is brought to him.

One has simply to go and visit one of these Ashrams in order to bring to daylight, a host of funny obnoxious practices of the sadhus, who sit crowned at the social summit commanding supreme homage from the Hindu Society, as will be denied to a man of the highest achievements in several spheres of civic life. It is a highly ingenious way by which these sadhus not only escape all social affront and abhorrence, but also find a suitable corner in the irrational heads and superstitious hearts of the backward people. The golden means to this dramatic transformation, is a simple one, a purple gown, and a pinch of ash to put the holy marks on the forehead—a veritable garb which enable the wolf to mix in a herd of harmless sheep.

If it is desired to purify our social life from the pollutions that are now attached to it, if it is necessary to save thousands from being victimized at the altar of rude and sickening ceremonies, it is imperative that propaganda on a large scale should be carried on, both in press and on platform. It will undoubtedly stimulate a spirit of enquiry and reasoning, where now is spread listless apathy and mute ignorance. The state can come to the help of the public in another way—by the forfeiture of wealth that is neither temple or charity property, but stands in the name of individuals who had no visible means or living except this ill-practised Bowaism.

A. S. BANAVALLIKAR.

MUSLIM MARRIAGES BILL.

Syed Ghulam Bhik Nairang M. L. A., will introduce in the next session of the Legislative Assembly a bill entitled the Muslim Dissolution of Marriage Bill having for its object the removal of all doubts as to the effect of apostasy of a married Muslim woman in relation to divorce. There have been many instances in which Muslim women are alleged to have changed their religion as the easiest mode of obtaining a divorce. The object of the bill is to remove this anomaly.

The main provisions of the bill are as follows:—

In a suit for dissolution of marriage brought by a Hanafi Muslim woman (i. e., a Muslim woman who professes to follow the tenets and doctrines of the Hanafi School of Muslim law) the provisions of the Maliki law shall constitute the rule of decision.

A married Hanafi Muslim woman may bring a suit against her husband for the dissolution of her marriage on any of the following grounds:—

(a) that her husband is absconding and cannot be traced;

(b) that her husband is impotent;

(c) that her husband is suffering from insanity of a dangerous type;

(d) that her husband is neglecting to maintain her;

(e) that her husband constantly and persistently maltreats her;

(f) on any other ground which may be sufficient under Muslim law of the Hanafi or Maliki School for the dissolution of marriage.

The conversion of a married Muslim woman to a faith other than Islam shall not by itself operate to dissolve her marriage.

The statement of Objects and Reasons says that the Muslim community has repeatedly given expression to its supreme dissatisfaction with the view upheld by courts, that apostasy by a Muslim woman ipso facto dissolves the marriage. Hence the Bill.

GOD AS MOTHER.

The conception of the Supreme Divinity has developed mainly along two lines—as the Father of the universe on the one hand, and as the Mother of the universe on the other. Man cannot possibly think of the Divine except in anthropomorphic terms, and it is therefore quite natural that he describes it as Father or Mother. In the Semitic religions which grow up in a social and ethical environment that was hostile to the due recognition of woman's dignity, the notion has gained ground that God is only the Father of the universe and not its Mother. To call Him Mother has been looked upon as sacrilegious. In religions of Indian origin, however, human imagination has never disdained to clothe the Supreme in the symbology of Motherhood without in any way hampering the growth of parallel theologies laying emphasis on the Fatherhood of the same Principle. In fact, even in the case of cults like Saivism and Vaishnavism, which look upon the Supreme as the Father, He is conceived as including in Himself the Mother element. God in these cults may therefore be described as a Father-Mother God, although they lay greater emphasis on the Father aspect and describe the Mother element as the creative and grace element in Him. Thus Siva is Uma-Maheswara and Vishnu is Lakshmi-Narayana, Uma and Lakshmi standing for the Mother element in both the cases. And when the symbolism is further concretised and brought to the human level, the Mother element is described as the consort of the Deity, through whom the Supreme brings forth the universe into existence and bestows his Grace on the souls that struggle for the same.

But there is however one school of thought in India which has conceived the Supreme as essentially the Mother of the universe. Even when admitting the presence of the Father element in it, this school describes that element only as the quiescent or static aspect of the Great Mother. This school of thought is known as the Saktas, and of all the Hindu sects it is pre-eminently the Mother cult proper. Embodying, as it does, a very high philosophy, a sublime outlook on life and a practical system of spiritual discipline, this sect, perhaps more than any other in India, has come to be misunderstood, and calumniated both by its own followers and its unsympathetic critics. By a strange perversity of human nature, certain followers of this sect have come to divest the Mother of Her Motherhood and to look upon Her only as the Great Female. As a consequence of this changed outlook all the ethical and spiritual implications of this great ideal came to be reversed. When the Mother idea was submerged by the idea of the pure Feminine, the sexual aspect came to be inordinately stressed in the conception of salvation, and what was worse a short-cut to salvation was devised by the theory that every woman in the world was an embodiment of that Great Female and that by congress with her to the accompaniment of certain ritualistic practices and mental disciplines, one could reach the state of supreme perfection. All the abuses of the Shakti cult, as the system of Mother worship is called, have sprung from this one disastrous step—the supplanting of the Mother idea by the notion of the Pure Feminine. The degenerate practices referred to above are the natural consequences of this change in outlook.

It was indeed an unparalleled perversion of human ingenuity that could foist such disgusting ethical implication on a doctrine so pure and philosophical as Shakti Vada. In the first place the conception of Divine Motherhood is never meant to impute any pre-dominant sexual attribute to the Supreme Divinity. If we are to view the Supreme Being who gives birth to the cosmos in the light of our human experience, there is an undeniable appropriateness in describing It as Mother instead of as father. And then again since the guiding principle in devotional practices is the cultivation of intimate relationship with the Divinity, it is quite natural if a devotee looks upon It as the Mother, seeing that the relationship between mother and son has an intimacy and tenderness unknown to the paternal relation. The conception of the Divine as Mother is thus meant only to imply this creativity of the Supreme and Its loving and intimate relationship with the soul, and not to stress on pure Feminineness as Its essential nature, or to sanction the immoral practices that have long been associated with the Shakti cult.

The ethical and spiritual implications of such a philosophy are quite apparent, and the speciality of the Mother cult in all its unsullied forms of development lies in having developed a system of practical spiritual disciplines based on those implications. Now one of the main problems of spiritual life consists in overcoming the dragging pull that the senses and their objects exercise on us. It is however the experience of every spiritual aspirant that no amount of conscious resistance and fight against the impelings of his lower nature take him even a step forward in the conquest of the primordial passions that struggle for expression in his bosom. On the other hand, all such violent efforts complicate the matter by inducing a constant remembrance of sensuous objects. The cult of Mother worship recognises this, and therefore points out that the way to success lies not in a magnified consciousness of evil as evil, but in transforming our outlook on it and learning to see the Divinity at the back of it. There is nothing in the universe which is not the Mother. It is because we forget this fact that we are subjected to attachment, infatuation and fear in the presence of objects that generally excite such feelings. But the Mother, says this cult with a boldness that may shock many a conventional theology, is as much in what is evil and fearful as She is in the good and peaceful experiences of life. The seductive and the alluring on the one hand, and the revolting, the destructive and the terrible on the other are in no way different from the pure, the lovely, the mild, and the life-giving in as far as they are all alike the manifestations of the Divine Mother in Her cosmic play. She is thus Avidya that takes man away from spiritual perfection and entangles him in worldliness, and She is also Vidya that confers on him spiritual illumination. Man is asked to recognise this great fact and in consequence to learn how to see the face of the Mother even in all the degrading influences of life and a manifestation of her glory even in the terrible and destructive aspects of Nature. When this attitude of mind is conscientiously and sedulously cultivated, it helps the spiritual aspirant not only to overcome the adverse influences of his elemental nature, but to direct the energy of those very downward-pulling tendencies to take him to the goal of spiritual perfection.

The cult of Mother worship has therefore devised certain systems of spiritual discipline according to which duly qualified aspirants are placed in the midst of environment that may be shocking, terrifying, revolting or seducing, and are trained by various methods of meditation and sublimation to recognise the Mother even in these so-called unspiritual situations and to direct the instinctive energies through higher channels for spiritual realisation. It is in connection with these disciplines that the Tantric works dealing with Mother worship, prescribe Sadhanas or spiritual practices in the dreadful surroundings of the cremation ground, or to the accompaniment of what have gained a notoriety as the Panchamakaras of the Tantrics. But consideration of the essential tenets of the doctrine has shown that the purpose of these disciplines is never to cater to the animal needs of man but to train the mind to recognise the presence of the Divine even in what is considered fearful or seductive in life.

For example let us take the presence of Shakti (or woman) in the worship, which is responsible for most of the abuses in this cult and the criticisms levelled against it. We have shown before that according to the fundamental postulate of this system the Supreme Being must be looked upon more as the Mother than as the Father of the universe. From this has sprung the ethical doctrine, so ennobling and purifying in effect, that every woman is in a special sense a symbol and a manifestation of the Divine Mother. A true follower of this cult cannot therefore entertain any other attitude except that of pure and unsoiled affection of a child towards its mother in regard to all individuals of the fair sex. It is therefore a doctrine that can form the bed-rock of an ethics which not only enforces kindness, equity and fairplay towards woman, but also kills the seeds of carnality in man's relationship with her and educates him in a feeling of pure reverence, bordering on worship, towards all women irrespective even of their character. But even the devil can quote scriptures and find higher sanctions for his base ends. The attempt of the corrupt Shaktas to find in Mother worship a sanction for their objectionable practices is perhaps the most glaring illustration of this perverse tendency in men. To call women the symbol of the Great Mother and simultaneously to look upon Her with a sexually contaminated eye is a feat which only the most heinous form of human perversity is capable of.

It has been remarked that the ethical and cultural integrity of any epoch in a nation's history can be measured by the position accorded to women in society and by the respect that man pays to womanhood in general—in other words by the extent to which the true worship of Shakti is practised by the society at large. Swami Vivekananda has very pertinently pointed out that the greatness of the modern West is largely attributable to its practice of the social worship of Shakti, to the genuine consideration it shows for the welfare of women and the high position it gives to them in society. But the Western mind is outwardgoing, and its respect for womanhood has been largely physical and intellectual. The seeds of corruption are latent in an outlook that adores the physical aspect of Shakti, and the supplanting of the old European ideal of chivalry by the grossly sensual standard of sexual ethics in contemporary West, is a natural consequence of this physical adoration of Shakti. Such a degeneration is a serious outrage of Divine Motherhood and consequently the surest way to national degeneration. Great social thinkers like Spengler have already remarked that the new sex-ethics of Europe is one of the surest symptoms of its approaching decline.

In India where the worship of Shakti in a religious sense has been in existence for ages past, its true spiritual significance, as we have already pointed out, has long been forgotten. Under such circumstances it is no wonder that nobody even suspects that it has any social significance at all. When the sublime conception of Mother worship was dragged down to the level of debauchery, the degradation of Indian culture was the natural consequence. From the social point of view, it is an irony of fate that the genius of the same nation that has given expression to the most exalted sentiments regarding womanhood has also devised theories libelling the essential nature of woman and advocating the denial of all freedom and opportunities of self-development to her. A reversal of this view of woman and the revival of the true Shakta ideal in this respect form the necessary condition of a cultural Renaissance in India.

THE FIGHT FOR PROHIBITION.

Many folks thought that with the repeal of the Eighteenth Amendment in the United States Prohibition was dead and done for. So it would have been dead and done for if those who believed in it had given up the struggle. The truth is that activity has never ceased in this sphere of making the world safe for sobriety.

There is a growing belief that the Conventions which repealed Prohibition were illegal bodies—and this is a matter which will doubtless be brought before the Supreme Court for settlement. But apart from this legal battle with the Wets, there is being heard throughout America a cry that is loud and strong against the ravages of Drink now becoming more and more apparent. Press reports to hand declare that "Prohibition Starts its Way Back"—evidence of the concern felt by sections of the people.

In Congress a bill has been introduced to restore Prohibition in the District of Columbia—which includes the Capital city of Washington—and in a number of States, counties and cities, Prohibition has already been sustained by popular vote.

But the fight for Prohibition is not confined to the United States. In other lands there is a rallying of the forces. New Parliaments, now being elected, must come to grips with the alcohol evil, as in a mechanical age such as this, social and other reformers—and those who are not strictly reformers—must take action. The next few years will see great changes for the better in the adoption of laws affecting prohibitory measures dealing with the liquor traffic. Whatever a man's views on the great political questions of the day, there is no gainsaying the fact that all problems will be better solved by a sober electorate: sober to the extent of not being in any way influenced by alcohol.

At the forthcoming General Election in New Zealand, National Prohibition will again be voted on. Handicapped though the Prohibitionists will be by the State Purchase and Government Control option the hard fight before them is of extreme importance and value to the whole community. In Australia and Canada, the struggle for prohibitory legislation is making headway. Prince Edward Island—the dry Canadian Gibraltar—continues its bold and successful policy, while the rest of the Dominion founders in the Wet morass of Government Control, which is really control by the Liquor Traffic. In South Africa, India and other parts of the British Commonwealth, together with many of the Continental nations of Europe, any change in the liquor laws anticipate little of worth to the Wets.

Similarly, in Great Britain and Northern Ireland, ere many weeks have passed, the electoral struggle is bound to rally the national Temperance bodies to some united frontal attack on the Liquor Traffic, the result of which should, at least result in giving the people power by Direct Veto to protect their areas and homes from the devastating influence of intoxicating liquors.

Thus the Prohibition forces struggle on. Some turn in the road here and there heartens the workers. But always while the liquor interest plies its iniquitous traffic will there be need and necessity for the vigilant eye and strong arm to check it and, in the end, crush its power over human lives.

TO PROSELYTIZE OR NOT?

True Hinduism or Brahmanism includes all religions of the world. Even those who repudiate all conventional religions are not outside its limitless fold, for it is equivalent to nobleness itself. Believing in the divinity of man and its sure and gradual unfoldment, Brahmanism embraces all and rejects none. Being all-inclusive, it is impossible for it to proselytize, for it means that there is something outside it, something other than itself, which it seeks to make its own. Brahmanism cannot convert. The editorial of the June 22 issue of The Indian Social Reformer has our support.

But we do not think that the Arya Samajist correspondent, Lala Devi Chand (in the same issue) is wrong either. His support of proselytization is as good as the Reformer's editorial repudiation, but only on different grounds. Brahmanism is universal but it comprises almost an infinite variety of sects and subjects differing from one another not merely as the Protestants do from the Catholics, but as the Christians from the Mohammedans. Now, is it wrong for a Brahmo to win over, morally and spiritually, a Sanatanist to his own fold, or for a Vaishnava to win over a Sakta? The losing sects grieve their loss as intensely as the losing religions. This is a fact. But this ought not to be. If the mere preaching of truth convinces a man that a certain sect or religion is better suited to his mentality, then others ought not to stand in his way of self-development. If we leave aside the question of oughtness and stand on facts, we must treat all sects and religions equally. So long as there goes on conversion in certain quarters other quarters cannot be advised to view their losses with philosophic equanimity. The sense of loss is not a monopoly of any particular sect or religion; it is something universal. To ask one who feels the loss to go on losing and sit weeping at home is certainly not a good piece of advice. Let them who feel the prick of loss act as aggressively as they can; and let them philosophize on universalism who will.

Many of us have a very poor idea of universalism. Universalism is not an empty abstraction; it expresses itself in particulars in the same way as the Infinite expresses itself in the finite. Universalism as it is in itself is not to be found in any society or form or church of religion, it is something to be felt, not in an empty void but in, through, and beyond everything. But these "everything's" are things with forms, limited concrete things, requiring protection and subject to expansion as well as dissolution. Very few there are who can dispense with concrete things and live in pure abstractions. This being a fact, our societies and churches ought to be protected and expanded by all moral means. Proselytization in this sense and in this way is a desirable thing, which, Brahmanism as a church or society or a group of either, cannot wisely and dutifully forego.

But all people cannot and do not see the universal in the particular; and they are the fanatics, who are destroyers wrongly engaged in works of construction. There are people again whose eyes are fixed more in the universal than in the particular. These preachers of universalism bring peace and goodwill among differing, and sometimes warring, sects and religions; but they too do not neglect the particulars nor preach against them but see and show their beauties and thus preserve and expand them. Both kinds of protection are necessary. The world we live in is not merely a world of ideas but a world of things and persons as well. The practical, though a somewhat narrow, method of proselytization is as necessary for one world, as the ideal method of the preaching of the universal in the particulars is for the other world.

UNTOUCHABILITY AND CONVERSION TO OTHER FAITHS.

A startling solution of the Harijan problem was offered by Dr. B. R. Ambedkar in his presidential speech (writes The Times of India Nasik correspondent, amplifying a news item sent by the Associated Press) at the Bombay Presidency Depressed Classes Conference at Yeola on Sunday evening. The conference was attended by 10,000 persons of all shades of opinion, including people from Hyderabad and the C. P.

Dr. Ambedkar, in a feeling speech lasting over an hour and a half, recounted the plight of the depressed classes in all spheres, economic, social, educational and political, and the immense sacrifices made by them to secure the barest human rights under the aegis of Hinduism.

Continuing, he narrated the inhuman treatment meted out to them by caste Hindus during the past five years, and their struggle to secure elementary rights in Hindu society and equal status through the Kalam temple entry movement.

He said it grieved him very much to state how the tyrannical caste Hindus thwarted Harijans' attempts throughout the country to obtain their rights as members of the same community. He particularly referred to the Kalam temple satyagraha and the Ram Rath procession satyagraha, which has now become a stalemate. He said he realised that the time, money and efforts spent over these matters have come to naught.

Dr. Ambedkar expressed the opinion that the time had come to make a decision in the matter and settle their future. The disabilities they suffered and the indignities they had to put up with, he pointed out, were the result of their being members of the Hindu community. He inquired if it were not better for them to leave that fold and embrace a new faith that would give them equal status, a secure position and rightful treatment.

He advised them to sever their connection with Hinduism and to embrace any other religion, but warned them to be very careful, in choosing the new faith to see that equality of treatment, status and of opportunities would be guaranteed them unreservedly. He referred them to the treatment accorded in other religions such as Buddhism, Islam and Christianity.

Referring to his own personal decision in the matter he said unfortunately for him he was born a Hindu "untouchable." It was beyond his power to prevent that, but he declared that it was within his power to refuse to live under ignoble and humiliating conditions. "I solemnly assure you that I will not die a Hindu," he declared.

Concluding, he referred to the coming constitution and the work before them of securing their rightful place in the new councils. He advised them to select the right men to represent them and to present their case as strongly as possible. That could only be done if they sank their internal difference and petty jealousies and presented a united front to the outside world.

Referring to the Kalam satyagraha and the temple entry agitation he advised Harijans to end them as the past years had demonstrated the futility of such agitation. Instead, they should conserve their energy to establish their civic rights and status. He exhorted them to so conduct themselves in future as to leave no doubt to the outside world of their decision to be and to remain a separate community outside the Hindu fold and to carve out for themselves a future worthy of free citizens.

Earlier in the conference Mr. A. D. Runkhambhe, Chairman of the Reception Committee, in his welcome speech expressed his pleasure at the response given by Presidency Harijans and the great interest they were evincing in planning their future. After making special reference to the numerous disabilities of the depressed classes, he gave some instances where Government officials are alleged to have favoured caste Hindus and discriminated against them.

GANDHIJI'S REJOINDER.

Interviewed on Dr. Ambedkar's speech at Nasik, Mr. Gandhi said:—

"The speech attributed to Dr. Ambedkar seems unbelievable. If, however, he has made such a speech and the conference has adopted a resolution of complete severance and acceptance of any faith that would guarantee equality, I regard both as unfortunate events, especially when one notices that in spite of isolated events to the contrary, untouchability is on its last legs.

"I can understand the anger of a high-souled and highly educated person like Dr. Ambedkar over atrocities such as were committed in Kawitha and other villages. But religion is not like a house or a cloak which can be changed at will. It is a more integral part of one's self than of one's body. Religion is the tie that binds one to one's creator and whilst the body perishes, as it has to, religion persists even after death.

"Dr. Ambedkar has faith in God. I would urge him to assuage his wrath and reconsider the position and examine his ancestral religion on its own merits and not through the weakness of its unfaithful followers.

"Lastly, I am convinced that change of faith by him and those who passed the resolution will not serve the cause which they have at heart, for the millions of unsophisticated illiterate Harijans will not listen to him and them when they have disowned their ancestral faiths especially when it is remembered that their lives for good or for evil are intertwined with those of caste Hindus."

A WRONG LEAD.

"Conversion to other faiths would weaken the numerical strength of the depressed classes and encourage their oppressors. The best advice to be given to the community is that they should keep up their strength and fight for their rights and privileges. That would be manly," observed Rao Bahadur R. Srinivasan (Madras), leader of depressed classes, in the course of a statement on the resolution advising depressed classes to leave the Hindu fold passed by the Nasik conference.

He added that the news came to him as a thunderbolt. He advised those who were unable to face their enemies to emigrate to some country where untouchability did not prevail.

NOT A HASTY DECISION.

"What religion we shall belong to we have not decided; what ways and means we shall adopt, we have not thought out; but we have decided one thing, and that after due deliberation and that deep conviction, that the Hindu religion is not good for us," declared Dr. Ambedkar when showed by the Associated Press, Gandhiji's comment on his Nasik speech advocating the severance of the Depressed Classes from the Hindu fold.

"Inequality," he said, "is the very basis of that religion and its ethics such that the Depressed Classes can never acquire their full manhood. Let none think that I have done this in a huff or as a matter of wrath against the treatment meted out to the depressed classes at Kavitha village or any other place. It is a deeply deliberated decision.

"I agree with Gandhiji that religion is necessary, but I do not agree that man must have his ancestral religion if he finds that religion repugnant to his notions of the sort of religion he needs as the standard for the regulation of his own conduct and as the source of inspiration for his advancement and wellbeing."

Asked when he proposed to get himself converted and whether there will be individual action or mass action, Dr. Ambedkar said, "I have made up my mind to change my religion. I do not care if the masses do not come. It is for them to decide. If they feel it is good they will follow me, but on the contrary if they feel it is not, they will not follow my example. My own advice is that Gandhiji should allow the depressed classes to chalk out their own line of action. Kavitha does not represent an isolated incident."

THE NEW CANCER TREATMENT.

(By W. J. JAMESON.)

Cancer is one of the most baffling diseases that medical men throughout the ages have had to contend with. Prior to 1895 surgery or cautery were the only means available to medical science for treating this dreaded disease, and in Jaffna today, surgery remains the only means of eradicating it. The year 1895 was the turning point in the history of medicine. Wilhelm Conrad Roentgen working alone in his laboratory in the University of Weurzburg discovered a fluorescence produced by "a new kind of ray". This was the birthplace of the first X-Ray. This discovery was a stimulus to physicists throughout the world investigating these X-Rays and other radio-active substances. M. and Mme. Curie studied radio-activity of a large number of minerals containing Uranium and Thorium and it is to them that we owe the discovery of radium. Radium is an element which is extracted from pitchblend, and is one of the rarest used metals in the world, there being scarcely over 2 pounds in the whole world today. A radium treatment bomb of 15 grams being constructed in Brussels, is costing 22½ lakhs of rupees. These two types of rays revolutionised the treatment of cancer and many patients are alive today because of their use either separately or in conjunction with surgery.

During this century considerable research in the use of X-Ray and Radium Therapy has shown their usefulness and their limitations. Radium is very expensive to purchase and is limited in its usefulness. In Germany they had only 10 grams of radium, with a population of 80 million people and were unable to purchase more. The scientists there began investigating means of producing a similar type of Ray from a mechanical source. Scientists of Siemens-Reiniger-Werke after years of steady investigation produced an X-Ray tube which would give a distribution of radiation comparable to that of radium. This X-Ray tube is on entirely different lines from the usual X-Ray tube.

The tube is entirely shock-proof, and the rays can be brought as near the patient as desired, and localised only on the seat of disease. This is possible, because of the construction of the X-Ray tube, which permits the cathode rays to be transformed into X-Rays, and to pass out of the end of the tube, and then through a suitable applicator which limits the rays, to the field of the tumour. It thus preserves the surrounding healthy skin and tissues which is one of the limitations of the present form of radiation. In certain deep tumours the tumour may be exposed by operation and the treatment applied directly to the tumour without injuring healthy tissues. The other important feature of this tube is that the depth of penetration can be controlled by voltage and filters, and healthy tissues behind a growth can be preserved. The variety of applicators permit the use of this tube in inaccessible places such as the tonsil, and direct application of rays with a penetration only the depth of the tonsil, can be secured. The treatment itself is absolutely painless. For tumours that are sensitive to touch or located in a sensitive spot such as the throat a local anaesthetic is used. The usual period of treatment for early cases covers ten days, with an application made for five minutes daily during this period. Late cases require a longer period.

This new form of treatment for cancer bears the name of its inventor Prof. Chaoul. Prof. Chaoul is a Radiologist in the Charite Hospital, Berlin, working in Pro. Sauerbruch's Clinic. He has been using four of these tubes for more than three years and there are many patients alive today because of this new type of treatment which has overcome some of the limitations of both deep X-Ray and Radium Therapy.

Dr. Vail, one of the leading Surgeons in India, developed the most malignant type of cancer of the neck and in spite of the fact that he used Radium and had surgery in India, the growth continued to grow. He flew to Germany where he anticipated further radical surgery, but discovered Prof. Chaoul. After an examination of the tumour, the Professor said he might cable back to his family that he could be cured in ten days. Dr. Vail returned to India fully cured and told me of this wonderful new treatment. I have seen a moving picture film of the cases treated by Prof. Chaoul and have thoroughly investigated this new type of treatment and am convinced that it is the best type of treatment for the most common form of cancer that we have in Jaffna, Oral Cancer.

I cabled to Dr. Mathew who was studying in Europe to go immediately to Chaoul Clinic and acquire a thorough knowledge and treatment of cancer by this new method, under Prof. Chaoul. Dr. Mathew has just returned to the island after several months of study with Prof. Chaoul and is most enthusiastic about this new blessing to Jaffna. Part of this outfit has already arrived and we hope by the end of next month to have the plant in operation.

I would just like to give a word of warning regarding cancer. Cancer is not an hereditary disease though a tendency of susceptibility may be inherited from parents who have had cancer. Some form of irritation is necessary to produce cancer in these susceptible individuals. The most common form of irritation that I know of in Jaffna is betel chewing. In about 96% of cases of cancer of the month, there is a definite history of prolonged betel chewing. In my opinion, cancer is definitely increasing in Jaffna. One way to eliminate this scourge is to eliminate the cause—chronic prolonged irritation. Nowhere in the world is cancer of the mouth so prevalent as in Ceylon and India where this habit of chewing is almost universal.

The second warning that I would like to give is that any form of treatment for cancer should begin early. New growth should be shown to a competent Doctor at the earliest possible moment. A small surgical operation at that time or an application of this new type of treatment would be likely to cure the condition within ten days. With neglect, the tumour grows into the deeper tissues and surgery may become impossible owing to the involvement of vital tissues. The result of radium and X-Ray in these late cases has been unsatisfactory, and even with this new type of treatment, the long standing cases will require prolonged treatment. The percentage of cures of cancer depends largely upon the time when the cancer treatment has been started. With our new treatment, I feel that cases will come to us earlier than when we had only surgery to offer.

Family Life in Russia:—The Soviet Government have passed several new measures to restore normal family life in Russia and tighten the matrimonial bonds which were loosened 18 years ago as an essential part in the creation of the Bolshevik social system. The most important decree concerns divorce. Hitherto a husband or wife could without warning enter a registry office and get a divorce immediately without even informing the divorcee. The right of divorce without the consent of the other party and without any judicial procedure remains intact, but both parties must now appear together before the registrar. Otherwise the one who seeks a divorce must wait until the authorities have informed the other partner what is afoot and invited his or her presence before the registrar. If the partner cannot be found there is a delay of six months, after which the divorce is granted without further formalities. Other new laws for restoring the family give the parents greater responsibility for their children, with the liability of three years' imprisonment for abandonment or malicious refusal to pay alimony.

Memel Elections:—The results of the Memel Elections held on September 28th have been officially announced. The German party obtained 24 seats out of a total of 29 and the Lithuanians five. Out of a total of 1,912,000 votes, 1,600,000 were registered. Each voter had twenty-nine votes. The German party obtained nearly a million votes. Memel, however, is under a Lithuanian Governor who is pseudo-dictator under the control, not of the Memel Diet, but of the Fascist Government in the Lithuanian capital.

NOTES

Indian Nationalists and the Reforms:—The All-India Congress Committee at its annual meeting in Madras postponed consideration of the question whether or not the Congress members of the Legislature, Provincial and Federal, should accept office if they returned with a majority—a policy which has been impressed upon it by some prominent members. The acceptance of office by Nationalists who have condemned root and branch the constitutional reforms would be a complete turning back upon their part. Subject to any unforeseen circumstances arising before the elections, the obvious course for such men would be to constitute a strong opposition which would thwart the mischievous consequences of the reforms but will also compel the supporters of the reforms to carry out in office the mandates of the popular party. In the conditions provided in the new Government of India Act this would be the best way in which nationalist members of the legislature would serve their country. In office they would be powerless. Almost before they begin the duties of their office they will find themselves up against the many obstacles provided in the Act to their national policy. Take the question of Currency—des-out by ministers at the centre, apart from the uncertainty when the federation section of the Act will come into operation. In the provinces we shall have legislation like the preposterous Motor Taxation Bill now before the Bombay Legislative Council which in order to abolish tolls raises taxes payable by a very large number of vehicles which never pass the toll bar or only once or twice a year. Some one has referred to the Irish precedent. Surely Irish precedent is all the other way. Mr. William Redmond refused to accept office in Mr. Asquith's ministry at the commencement of the War although he gave his entire support to the Government in recruiting soldiers from Ireland and in other ways.

Congress and the Non-Brahmins:—Babu Rajendra Prasad's answer to the charge of the Justice Party that the Congress was a Brahmin movement, evaded the real issue. He said that it was not true because Gandhiji, Vallabhbhai Patel and himself are non-Brahmins. But Satyamurthi, Prakasam, Nageswararao Pantulu and Rajagopalachariar are Brahmins and the Justice Party which is mainly concerned with provincial politics, is justified in regarding the Congress as a Brahmin movement, if a movement is to take its colour from the caste of its prominent leaders. The real question, however, is, if this is a right test to apply to a movement. Surely not the caste of some prominent leaders but the aims and objects of a movement determine the character of that movement. Babu Rajendra Prasad's reply implies that if Gandhiji, Vallabhbhai Patel and himself were Brahmins, the charge that the Congress movement was a Brahmin movement would be justified. He failed to take notice of the fact that the anti-Brahmin feeling of the Justice Party is to be compared, according to the friendly suggestion of the Catholic Leader, to the anti-semitic feeling in Nazi Germany. Catholics and Mohammedans are also included in the Justice Party and the Catholic Leader is a supporter of that party. The Congress has or should have nothing to do with the caste or religion of its members. If Babu Rajendra Prasad was not prepared to recognise that many of the great leaders of Indian nationalism have been Brahmins, he might have at least refrained from seeming to countenance the petty anti-Brahminism of the Justice Party.

Dr. Ambedkar's Suggestion:—What is cribed in the press as Dr. Ambedkar's suggestion that a hard-headed bullion shell turned out to be a hard-headed bullion caste Hindus are concerned to abandon the faith and classes to the promised another unspecified religion has been calmly received by caste Hindus; some of them have even expressed their satisfaction that they will not have the problem of the untouchables on their hands. In view of Dr. Ambedkar's threat they would have themselves taken the initiative in the matter but that Hindu society is so constituted that only the particular group to which the man belongs, has the right to put him out. The same principle applies to any caste admitting non-Hindus to its membership. He becomes a member of Hindu society which has no means of acting in such matters. The representatives of the proselytising religions, the Christians, the Muslims and Sikhs have invited Dr. Ambedkar to throw in his lot with them. The Maha Bodhi Society has sent a message deprecating his intended apostasy but stating that if he is, however, determined to leave Hinduism, Buddhism has all the requisites which he desiderates in his religion. A few Hindus have expressed the view that the work of Hindu leaders like Gandhiji and Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya, has mitigated Dr. Ambedkar's threat as great advance has already been made towards the removal of untouchability. It is from other untouchable leaders, however, that the strongest protests have come against Dr. Ambedkar's declaration. A few of them handsomely acknowledged the work that is being done by earnest Hindu reformers but the majority take the view that by going over to any other religion the depressed classes would forfeit the special rights conferred on them by the new constitution. As Christians and Mohammedans, they would form part of the separate electorates of those communities and would not be in the same favourable position in which they are now by retaining the character of scheduled castes conferred on them by the Government of India Act. This is a curious argument for remaining in or rejecting a religion but there it is—a part of the mentality fostered by the reforms.

Caste and Conversion:—Conversion to Buddhism seems to find favour with some leaders of the antyajas as the best means of getting rid of the social disabilities to which they are subjected as Hindus. We do not think that conversion to Buddhism would have such a magical effect. Even in Buddha's own time, although he admitted even sweepers to his Sangha, the caste system flourished side by side and continued to govern social relations. That is to say, the laity did not cease to observe caste distinctions in marriage and meals. The Harijan Sevak Sangh has also laid down that its propaganda excludes these two matters. The only effect of conversion to Buddhism would be that the Mahars and others will be known as Buddhist Mahars and so on. The Kavitha caste people would have the same "on to have their children attending common s the 11 11 t present. But conversion uly conversion will certainly o look upon their present ntirely different standpoint—namely, the inexorable law of Karma, which is at the heart of the Sakyamuni's teaching. We are sure Dr. Venkatrao, the President of the Buddha Society, will welcome antyaja brethren who wish to study Buddhism, to the Ananda Vihar at Lamington Road where there is a good library and a shrine which breathes the spirit of peace inherent in Buddhism. It is not generally known that there are today many anusthanic, or practising, Buddhists among Hindus of all castes. The last Dr. Nair was such a one and we are glad that his family is following in his footsteps. In May last we had a Brahmin Buddhist, Judge of the Mysore High Court, presiding at the Buddha anniversary in Bombay. Those who would become Buddhists would do well to bear in mind that five centuries before Jesus said, 'Love your enemies,' the Sakyamuni proclaimed, 'Hatred is not conquered by hatred : Hatred is conquered by Love.' We are glad to see that the Dnyanodaya of Poona, while appreciating Dr. Ambedkar's viewpoint, has emphasised that conversion means a change of heart and not a change of community. It writes, "In the stir and agitation resulting from Dr. Ambedkar's speech and Gandhiji's comment the word 'conversion' has been used as if it meant a mere change of community. This is one of the commonest blunders in India and every Christian speaker or writer on this subject should help to restore this wonderful word to its only correct meaning of a conversion of heart. By emphasizing a change of community, India has inherited one additional curse, that of communalism. But when we emphasize a change of heart, then we come to understand the meaning of Jesus : 'Except ye be converted and become as little children ye cannot enter into the Kingdom of God.' Those who would be in the Kingdom of God on earth as Jesus taught it must undergo such a change of heart that child-like trustfulness in God, and true humility (the only basis of democracy) in relation to both God and men, must mark their daily life and character. Without such an inward change, effected by the Spirit of God Himself, Dr. Ambedkar and his oppressed brethren will find Buddhism, Islam or Christianity, as unsatisfying as Hinduism. "For the Kingdom of God is within you," said Jesus." By the way in another note the Dnyanodaya insinuates that Dr. Ambedkar's preferment to some unspecified high offices was prevented by caste Hindus. High offices, such as those to which Dr. Ambedkar may aspire, are not in the gift of caste Hindus as the Dnyanodaya is well aware, and, if Dr. Ambedkar did miss preferment, the reason must be sought elsewhere.

Ethiopia and the League:—When a house is on fire the thing immediately to do is to put down the conflagration. What the League of Nations is doing now with its committees of five and eight and thirteen and eighteen is to devise means of depriving the incendiary of his business while the slaughter of women and children in Ethiopia is merrily going on. Mr. Baldwin, the British Prime Minister, told the House of Commons on Wednesday that this is the only thing that could be done having regard to the League Covenant. If that be the case, the Covenant must be a surprisingly inept document. The strength of the League depends on the extent to which it reflects the moral sense of mankind. There is no difference of opinion as to the culpability of Italy in its aggression on a primitive nation almost entirely without the modern equipment for mass murder. It may be said that each nation has enough to do to look after its own safety to undertake to defend weak nations against those who would despoil them. The League of Nations was established to safeguard weak nations as one of its primary objects. Nevertheless the argument for non-intervention in the present Italo-Ethiopian dispute might have some force but for the fact that the whole claim of Italy to subjugate Ethiopia rests on engagements entered into with Britain and France regarding the disposal of Ethiopia, engagements to which Ethiopia was not a party and when they were brought to her notice, refused to be a party. Ethiopia, it is said, is not competent to be a sovereign State. Is Portugal competent? Is Belgium competent? Is Denmark competent? Oh, but, it is said, slavery prevails in Ethiopia. There is a chapter in Mr. Farago's 'Abyssinia on the Eve' which we noticed in the Reformer of October 12, on this question of slavery. Domestic slavery as it exists in Ethiopia is very different from the slavery depicted in "Uncle Tom's Cabin," which comes to the mind of most people when they hear slavery mentioned. The domestic slave in Ethiopia enjoys a status superior to that of the paid servant. He is a sort of retainer who can be raised to any position. He sometimes marries his master's daughter. If the master marries his daughter, she enjoys the same status as the free-born wife and her children are heirs to their father's property. The 20,000 slaves whom the Italians are proclaimed to have liberated in the parts of Ethiopia occupied by Italian troops, must either starve or join the Italian army against their kith and kin in an enforced servitude.

The Churches and Imperialism:—The "Christian" reaction to the Italo-Ethiopian dispute has been anything but unanimous. The International Federation of Religious Socialists which is an organization covering several European countries and associated with similar associations in America, has issued a last appeal to Christendom. The appeal threatens a "savage" revolt of Blacks against Whites and the rejection of Christianity by a large part of the world, as a consequence of the present Italian aggression. "Will you not," it concludes, "with a last effort, stand up against this whole ruinous course of things which is so much worse than all paganism ever was and is? Against these universal preparations for war growing gradually into a worship of the infernal?" In similar vein is Mr. George Lansbury's condemnation of the Archbishop of Canterbury's support to the application of sanctions. "Today," he writes, "Christians of all denominations are organised to carry out a mass murder. Apart altogether from the Italo-Abyssinian dispute, the youth of the world is now being urged to make ready for another war to end war. From one end of the world to the other, a most terrific race in armaments is in full swing. To meet this crisis, I ask that the Christian Church of our land shall demand from our rulers a declaration by Britain that: 'We, the British people, have given up all desire for Imperial conquest and intend in future to rule in any part of the world only with the consent of the governed, and because we wish for neither power nor domination over others, we will henceforth depend for our existence on the laws of love and service as taught by our Lord, and not on force, and without waiting for others' aid, we will disband our armed forces and invite the world to follow our example.' But the Archbishop of Canterbury is unrepentant. He has even hinted in a recent speech that, if the League applied drastic sanctions against Italy, the Pope who had expressed his inability to go farther in support of the League than he has already done, might feel freer to express his views. Mr. Lausbury, however, does not suggest any measure for stopping the callous slaughter of Ethiopians which cannot have left him unmoved. In discussing the larger issue he has evidently lost sight of Ethiopia's present trouble.

A Hoax on Bullion Merchants:—Press messages dated the 21st instant revealed the perpetration of a colossal hoax on the Bombay and Calcutta markets. A number of European bankers and prominent brokers in Bombay received, according to the Associated Press, a letter from Simla, purporting to have been issued by the Commerce Department, Government of India, stating that the import duty on silver had been removed and an export duty of Rs. 10 per ounce on gold levied. The news created excitement in the market, followed by heavy loading and unloading in the two metals. Silver, which closed on Saturday in Rs. 67-7 first settlement, shot up to Rs. 70-12 first settlement, while gold which closed at Rs. 35-0-9 on Saturday suddenly dropped down to Rs. 31-12. Frantic efforts were made by merchants and other interested parties to get into touch with Delhi, as there was a suspicion that the "notifications" were a hoax. In an hour came the reply from Delhi denying the basis of the alleged notifications, and the markets came to normal. A United Press message revealed that the report had repercussions on the Calcutta Stock Exchange. The hoax reveals that the policy of the Government of India regarding gold and silver is so artificial that a wild rumour of this kind affects the hard-headed bullion merchants of Bombay and Calcutta.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

BOMBAY, October 26, 1935.

ANTI-INDIAN LEGISLATION IN ZANZIBAR.

The Commission on Agricultural Indebtedness appointed by the Government of Zanzibar has made its report. Although it is treated as a confidential document by the Government of India it has been published in Zanzibar and commented upon in the Zanzibar Press. The Zanzibar Voice writes of the appointment of the Commission as the one normal and satisfactory action of the Zanzibar Government during the last two years. In its opinion the personnel of the Commission was as representative as could be desired, but, adds the Zanzibar Voice, "in nothing was the Commission so fortunate as the choice of its Chairman, Mr. C. E. Law, Chief Justice of the Protectorate." There were, besides, two English officials on the Commission, Mr. J. P. Jones, Assistant Chief Secretary and Provincial Commissioner (Vice-Chairman), and Mr. J. Parnall, Administrator-General, Land Officer and Public Trustee. There was one Arab Member, Sheikh Seif bin Suleiman el-Busaidi, and an Indian member, Mr. Tayabali Rajabali, Bar-at-Law. The Report is unanimous and it completely vindicates the position of Indians who were sought to be discredited as exploiters of the ignorant Africans and Arabs. The Committee, in contradiction to the assumption of the Zanzibar Government in support of its recent decrees, shows that the relative proportion of debts to assets of the Zanzibar cultivators is not so heavy as it would appear to be at first sight. Referring to the fact that only 5,432 owners out of approximately 18,000 replied to the questionnaire issued to them to give particulars of their indebtedness, the Commission observe: "Either the remaining 12,500 odd owners were completely indifferent as to their ultimate fate, or they did not reply because they were not financially embarrassed. If the latter surmise be the correct one, the position which presents itself, on the figures quoted, appears to be that about 30% of the owners are indebted and that about 23% of the total indebtedness is by way of mortgage or fictitious sale." The Commission has no difficulty in showing that there are at least 1,000,000 clove trees more than the official estimate in Zanzibar and out of these Indians owned approximately 12½% of the total and the number of clove trees mortgaged to Indians was 7½% of the total. After a close examination of the figures the Commission observe: "It is stated in the Bartlett-Last Report (paragraph 55) that 'it is probable that not less than half the agricultural property of these islands has passed into the hands of the money-lending classes and that at least half the remainder is encumbered to them, most of it heavily.' We find that the above expression of opinion is not borne out as a result of our investigations. We are, of course, aware of the fact that there are moneylenders other than Indians, but we feel that the amount so involved is, comparatively speaking, negligible. Before leaving the subject of Indian holdings, we desire to point out that such property as has passed into Indian hands has not passed into the hands of the money-lending classes exclusively, for there are in the Protectorate Indians who hold properties as bona fide investors and agriculturists."

The Commission recommend the setting up of Conciliation Boards with the object of bringing creditors and debtors together with a view to settling the debts and that Government should assist plantation owners with loans at low rate of interest. The Commission conclude by recommending that the moratorium created under the provisions of Section 19 of the Alienation of Land Decree should be lifted as soon as possible after a decision has been taken by Government regarding the liquidation of existing debts. We are surprised to see that the Government of Zanzibar oppose the Commission's central recommendation—namely, the creation of Conciliation Board. The Zanzibar Government refuses to accept the Commission's carefully worked out estimate of the number of clove trees and the extent of holding by Indians. It says:—"The Government, after a careful and exhaustive examination of the grounds on which the Commission based certain conclusions to which it came on these matters, has found it necessary to inform the Secretary of State that it is impossible for it either to accept the reasons given by the Commission for its conclusions or to agree with the conclusions themselves. Government is satisfied that the restriction upon alienation of land is absolutely essential in the interests of the agricultural classes and without such restriction the rapid transfer of land away from such classes will continue." We are astonished that the Government of Zanzibar should thus throw overboard their own commission, consisting of the Chief Justice, the Assistant Chief Secretary and the Administrator-General. The decision now lies in the hands of the Secretary of State for Colonies and we trust that Mr. Malcolm McDonald will not allow himself to be misled by the Zanzibar officials.

The Zanzibar Land Alienation has been compared to the Punjab Alienation Act. The Zanzibar Voice gives a complete answer to this misimpression. It writes:—"It is necessary to clear an erroneous idea, which unfortunately has had too long a run. In justification of the 'Land Alienation Decree' reference has been made to similar legislation in India. However the conditions in India are entirely different. In India the agriculturists are a hereditary class, who have for numerous generations tilled and cultivated the soil and waged a grim struggle against nature 'red in tooth and claw,' to preserve their land or their right to occupy it. The debt which such land carries, is often an accumulation of debt incurred by previous generations of holders. The Law of Limitation in Indian States is entirely different from here and Hindus as a rule consider it their duty to pay the debts of their fathers. Nor does the system of joint family property prevail here. In Zanzibar in many cases clove plantations have been purchased by present owners with borrowed capital. These shambas have been bought often as a matter of investment or speculation and the debts are incurred by present owners only. Total failure of crops due to various natural causes beyond the control of man is practically unknown in Zanzibar except in the case of the great storms in 1872. Besides land tenures and land revenue systems in India are entirely different and involve different considerations. For all these reasons it is erroneous to compare the shamba owners in Zanzibar with the agriculturists in India. Where else did produce give such large and easy returns as cloves did in Zanzibar, at any rate upto 1932?"

JOURNALISM IN INDIA.

The first thing that strikes one looking back some forty years on Indian Journalism is the remarkable decline in number and importance of newspapers controlled and conducted by Englishmen. At that time, there were 9 important Anglo-Indian papers: 2 in Madras, 2 in Bombay, 3 in Calcutta, 1 in Lahore and 1 in Allahabad. The last one, the 'Pioneer' was the most important as it was regarded as more or less written by high English officials or at least inspired by them. One famous leading article headed, "If it is real what does it mean?" on the great demonstration in Bombay when Lord Ripon left India, was said to have been written by Sir Auckland Colvin, the then Lieutenant Governor of the United Provinces. The other Anglo-Indian papers were also more or less semi-official organs in normal times. When there was any official measure which seemed to trench on the privileges of the European community, like the Ilbert Bill, the Anglo-Indian press speaking generally sided with their community against the Government. With the beginning of the century the position of the Anglo-Indian press steadily declined. Madras and Bombay which had two papers each had to be content with only one. In Calcutta where there were three papers, two expired including the 'Englishman' which at one time almost rivalled the 'Pioneer' in its influence in official circles. The 'Pioneer' has within recent years become an Indian concern. This decline of the Anglo-Indian press is synchronous with the introduction of the elective principle in the legislatures and the admission of Indians to offices long reserved for Englishmen including membership in the Executive Council in the provinces and at the centre; and with the growing strength of Indian nationalism. Another reason for its decline in influence has been the growing tendency among Europeans in India to regard themselves as a minority community whose interests have to be safeguarded by statute. The Anglo-Indian press, therefore, has come to be regarded as a communal press whose outlook is limited by the communal horizon. British journalists of independent outlook no longer come out to India or, if they do, they very soon find their position intolerable and take the earliest opportunity of quitting it. Had the Anglo-Indian papers been alive to the signs of the time and adapted themselves to the changing conditions they would have retained their influence and led the Indian press in journalism. Even now it is not too late. If, however, they persist in their isolation from Indian nationalism, the Anglo-Indian press as a distinctive factor in Indian journalism, has no future.

Another feature of Indian journalism worth noting is the experiment of running newspapers financed and controlled by Indians, with English editors. With a few exceptions the experiment has failed and it is bound to fail for obvious reasons. The problems that are coming up for discussion and solution nowadays are problems which concern the structure, traditions and inner workings of Indian society. It is only Indians who can appraise the real value of the slogans which the partisans use from time to time. The English editor is under constant temptation to shout with the loudest for fear of being considered disloyal to his employers or to adopt an extremely reactionary view in sympathy with his countrymen here. It is not his fault but the position is an anomalous one.

Coming to the purely Indian press, 50 years ago there was not even a single Indian daily paper conducted in English. Now we have a dozen well established daily papers. Some which were started, have died and these, speaking generally, were rather given to extreme expressions of opinion. The English-reading Indian public although it may temporarily applaud strong language has a permanent bias in favour of balanced judgment in public affairs. It is worthy of note that few of our daily papers, though they support one or other of the political parties, are party organs. They hold themselves free whenever occasion arises to criticise party leaders. This is a healthy sign. Attempts, whether by Government or political parties, to dictate to the press must be resisted in the interests of Journalism as also of national progress. The generality of Indian editors has a wider view of things than the average party politician. Further, the press is always in session and able to take a continuous view of passing events. The vernacular daily papers have also risen in importance but their influence is necessarily confined to the linguistic areas. There were polyglot newspapers written in two or three languages but there are fewer of them now than before. All-India newspapers, until the time comes when India has a common vernacular, will have to be conducted in the English language.

Weekly newspapers have an important function apart from that of the daily papers. While the tendency of the daily paper is to subordinate the views side to the news side, the weekly paper has the special privilege to form and guide public opinion to a much greater extent than the daily papers. The writer in a weekly paper has a quite different standard from the writer in a daily paper. In fact, the same man writing in both a daily and a weekly paper, instinctively recognises the difference. The weekly paper is not a daily paper published once a week. The attempt to make it so has resulted in the loss of influence of some well-established weeklies which have yielded to the temptation.

I think the weekly journal has a great future. The daily newspaper partakes of the nature of a factory and a trading concern. These two latter have no necessary relation to journalism. The future State will, undoubtedly, take over the collection and free dissemination of news which is now done by private agencies at a heavy cost. The radio has immense future possibilities and the time is not far distant when the cost of a receiver will come within the means of the masses. The public, therefore, will not depend on a daily with its expensive machinery for news which will be supplied free to it. What the public will then want is only carefully considered comments on the news so supplied and this will be provided by small weekly sheets which can be produced and distributed cheaply.

The greatest single force in the making of the destinies of future India is the press. Its freedom is of the utmost importance as it is only through a free press that the Indian people can become conscious and unite in achieving their national destiny. Communalism is, perhaps, the greatest obstacle in the way and the highest task of an Indian journalist today, is to counteract communalism by pursuing steadily a policy of understanding, conciliation and good-will; while at the same time upholding the cause of a single and equal citizenship for all those who accept India as their homeland.

ORGANISING FOR A BETTER WORLD.

As a result of the process of human growth, the modern world has been confronted with three imperative demands—an economic demand for the increased necessities of life, a scientific demand for efficiency and organisation, and a religious demand for equality and freedom. These demands, through whatever channel they may find expression, come from the people themselves, the abused, the voiceless and unarmed masses of the world that are divided by the various national governments among themselves. All the movements that are moving on earth today in the name of humanity are in fact efforts to meet either of these demands. But none of them carries with it the heart of mankind as a whole. The boundary lines between politics and religion and between religion and the actualities of life are so clear-cut that the life of society is divided into water-tight compartments and sub-compartments intertwined with incorrigible customs. Neither between the functions nor between the functionaries is there harmony and collaboration. And those few who are prepared to work for the ends of humanity are not finding the means to proceed further in building the edifice of human freedom.

During the days when the force of hunger alone was acting on the human stage, there existed certainly some sort of equality and unconscious justice even as that which still exists among animals. But no sooner did intellect make its appearance than it incited those individuals who are inclined to follow its lead, to make the best use of the things that surrounded them even at the cost of others. Soon they learnt to employ tactics and energy to produce, to sow and reap, to hoard and spend, to serve and employ and to make organised efforts to satisfy the increased requirements of a complex life. Selfishness was made possible, the origin of exploitation. A person gifted with superior intellectual powers but not disposed to increase his wealth or fight for needs which were not supplied to many of his other fellow-beings, is beaten in the rivalry of life by one who is inclined to do so. Investment and possession have become a power. As such they are objects of envy and all those who could wield that power were forced to protect it against those who tried to compete for its possession. The politician-soldier came to their rescue. But the two classes, sprung from these two distinct but identical interests, being unproductive, had to levy two different kinds of taxes on the productive masses. The tax levied by the politician-soldier formed the revenue of the policy which he had organised in the name of the community, and which in fact was a bulwark against any possible attack on the exploitation which he sought to protect; and the tax which is collected by the businessman on all the things he sold, formed the wealth of nations which in reality was the private property of a few. This latter revenue of the businessman not only includes the Marxian "surplus value" or the profit a capitalist gets on all the things he himself produces through his own factories of either men or machines, but also what he derives through trade, by investing on purchases and selling the goods at extraordinary prices. Now that scientific improvements in the monetary system as well as machinery have been made to a large extent, it has become easier for the same businessman to invest more and gather more. The bank hoards for him and the improved machinery makes it possible for him to dispense with human labour and yet produce much more. And the politician-soldier continues to protect him, to enlarge his territory by extending his empire, and to organise the rest of humanity to submit the exploitation. The bigger businessman has swallowed the smaller one, while bigger kingdoms have swallowed weaker ones. Thus capitalism and imperialism have developed hand in hand.

But this is not the whole story. From behind these forces of hunger and intellect, the force of emotion was evolving with equal, if not greater, rapidity and both of them are now at a point of being outpaced. Amidst all peoples, amidst all classes and sections one deep and positive longing is commonly growing—the longing to be free, to be free from all kinds of wants and oppressions; to be free to grow higher and greater. If suffering domination and slavery are international evils, the desire to be free from them is an international emotion. Consequently rebellions and attempts to change the existing systems in favour of an organisation which might secure a greater measure of freedom are common throughout the world.

International evils can be removed only by super-national efforts. The bulk of humanity must move as one force against the present economic and social anarchy which has always favoured the fortunate few. The defective social organism can be remedied only by an organised movement conducted by a representative body of the world masses as a whole. Stray individuals, however powerful they are, and the institutions they develop can do little to bring about a thorough-going change in this seemingly omnipotent system under which humanity is ceaselessly labouring.

A society can move or think only through an organisation, and the desire to be free which is universal must seek a universal organisation in order to translate itself into a reality. This is where Cole found fault with the cosmopolitanism of Wells, when he said that his scheme needs an international organisation which is absent today, to put it into practice. He did not say, however, that it is not possible to create such an organisation. As long as there is population on this earth, so long is there the possibility of organising a common platform, a common meeting place where all of them can together deliberate on issues which concern them as a whole and assert themselves against wrongs done to them. The realisation by the masses of the world that their interests are common is the first step towards realisation of world unity and towards the universal movement for freedom. Therefore the greatest need of today is a fully representative organisation, which stands for humanity as a whole and its complete freedom.

But the ideal should be clean and the programme must be scientifically laid down. The main incentive, the central force lying behind all successful movements, is but the motive power of the ideal, and it is the idealities of the dawn that move the dark realities of the night. Otherwise there would be stagnation and relentless darkness. What moves the present is the hope of the future. All of us are prepared to take all risks, sacrifice everything we have, if there appears on the scene a ray of hope, a promise of a way out of oppressions and exploitations.

If what we want is an extreme and undiluted form of democracy, it should be an educated democracy, otherwise it would break in the very process of construction. The people of all nations should not only be brought together, not only be fed well, but also should be educated enough to bear the responsibilities of their own social well-being. This process would naturally evolve an ethical and international constitution which can be called a state, but it would be a state without a policy, a law without class-safeguards, where every member of the society, is in himself an officer in charge and at the same time the immediate as well as ultimate beneficiary.

Life can become light and easy only if you take it seriously and work for its freedom. Its freedom consists in the perpetual feeding of our physical and intellectual needs and in its capacity to make positive advance towards self-realisation or emancipation or expansion, resisting effectively the temptations of vice or viciousness. Despair must cease—despair that gave birth to the dangerous theories of the omnipotence of fate and theories that justified the miseries of slavery. Ignorance and poverty, though they were born one after the other, have coupled themselves so intimately that they refuse to die separately. Intellectual and economic slaveries have become a custom but it is custom which is skin-deep. Inside is the burning desire to be free. Now if at any time, there could be a concentrated action on behalf of humanity as a whole. For if ideas have brought us closer, science has brought us nearer. All secrets are exposed and all boundary lines erased. To make the best use of all our achievements and resources, we must come together, seek scientific methods to get out of the difficulties that confront us and then make positive advance towards all round freedom, physical, intellectual as well as spiritual. If we must live, we must have the fitness to live.

Certain thinkers are of opinion that an eternal compromise between the nations of the world (through their governments) may bring about some sort of peace in the world. But peace is not merely warlessness. There cannot be any peace as long as humanity is within the four walls of the prison. The peace we want is the peace that lies in the freedom of our wings. A compromise between nations of conservative, capitalist and imperialist ideologies, controlled by people who are caught in the toils of party feelings and superiority complex, means nothing to the suffering masses. It is not the united action of the negative governments but the organised action of the people themselves that can save them from further onsets of want and its attendant misery.

Civilisation is harmony in social life. Love and exploitation, progress and poverty, wisdom and war, intelligence and ignorance, reason and stagnation, organisation and chaos, these things cannot go together. Harmony can be achieved through the organised utilisation of all our resources for the proper feeding of all the faculties of the inner soul. Unutilised or undirected human energy is the origin of all wars and misunderstandings. The wars that were fought and the one that is being fought today, are exposing in what helpless plight humanity is. One man with the political machinery in his hand can drive a people against their own fellow-beings in another nation. Politicians, priests, bankers all have divided the voiceless people, the bulk of humanity, among themselves and are utilising them endlessly for their own selfish ends. All governments profess to stand for our cause and betterment. Yet most of us remain ignorant and poor. The immediate need of the world is an organisation for the people to make them independent, unanimous, prosperous and progressive, to build for them a social order which would wipe out national boundaries and keep humanity under one law, the law that has nothing in conflict with the moral code of nature.

The first task of that representative body is to organise its branches throughout the length and breadth of the world and through them monopolise the trade. With the profits gathered there, it should start electrification and education. Having electric power in hand it can start wholesale industrialisation, thus monopolising the whole of the businessman's tax. By then, excluding agriculture, every economic activity will have been in the hands of the masses. All employees of that representative body (or the world peoples conference or congress) must be very highly qualified and this condition itself would be a great incentive for learning. And even during the time of employment it should be made a condition that every employee must spend a certain time for further improvement of his or her mental faculties. One world university must be organised and all the programme for education must be conducted through it. In the beginning, much of the schooling has to be conducted under the shade of trees or through correspondence. But ultimately it is possible, if the economic side of reconstruction makes steady progress to turn every village into an educational centre in itself and every individual life into a fight for the realisation of beauty and truth. It is then that the society will be able to frame rules for the general conduct of its members even without the help of the scheming politician-soldier. That would be the beginning of human freedom—perhaps, the only possible beginning.

Allahabad,

M. N. RAO.

THE MISSIONARY MOTIVE.

Mahatma Gandhi has appealed once again to the "great and rich Christian Missions" requesting them to "confine their activities to humanitarian service, without the ulterior motive of converting India (or at least her unsophisticated villagers) to Christianity and destroying their social superstructure."

This appeal will naturally be discounted, by those whose philanthropic services are still solicited, as the pathetic cry of a charity child which does not know its ailments and wants to be rid of medication but seeks to cling to the sugar with which the drugs are coated.

The Right Reverend Dr. Mathias, Archbishop of Madras, in his quick and sharp reply, issued through a reporter of the Madras Mail, promptly disowns and pricks the bubble reputation which seems to assume that Christian Missions have been sent over here to pour out the riches of the West in charity for healing the sick and relieving the distressed masses of this country. His Grace is surely on unassailable ground when he declares that their "first and chief motive, and not merely an ulterior motive, is to conquer India for Christ," by preaching the Gospel and leading souls to Him, which is in itself a work supremely humanitarian, and that their other humanitarian activities are merely incidental.

"It is the command of God; it is His work; these souls are His; He has committed them to our care, and at the judgment seat, He will demand an account of them." Such is the stern motive and motto recommended to Christian religious workers by the Reverend author of "Imago Christi" or Example of Christ.

It is this "command of God" and "committal to our care" from which has developed the doctrine of Spiritual Trusteeship which, apart from and independent of the twin doctrine of political trusteeship, is the driving force behind Christian Missions in India and everywhere else in the world to the south and east of the Mediterranean as far as the Pacific. It is the doctrine by which every follower of Christ, especially every one born in the Western climes favoured with a long and rich Christian tradition behind them, is enjoined and privileged to regard himself as the keeper of his non-Christian brother's soul, and has to engage himself incessantly in contriving means to make him accept the Christian gospel and turn with loathing from the ways of his parents, pronouncing them dark, superstitious and ungodly (vide Reformer of 23rd February 1929, page 404.)

"It is an undoubted fact that Hindu parents of the higher castes fiercely resent all attempts on the part of Christian Missionaries to take a child away from its ancestral home and subject it to the steady influence of Christian teaching," says Judge Paul Appasamy M. A., LL. B., in his illuminating book on the Law Applicable to Christians in India written for the National Christian Council; or they also regard such attempts as "a breach or abuse of the confidence that they have reposed in Christian Missionaries."

But no Christian Missionary true to his faith and calling can help incurring the blame or even courting it. He cannot possibly afford to abandon his God-ordained duty and throw away his God-given privilege at the request of any human being. His own soul-salvation and rank in Heaven depend upon the numerical results which he can manage to show, of his faithful trusteeship on earth, when questioned on the awful Day of Judgment.

I know thou hast believed on Me
And light through Me is thine,
But where are all those glorious stars
Which in thy crown should shine?
Thou seest yonder joyous throng
With gems on every brow,
For every soul they led to Me
They wear a jewel now!

Mr. Paul Appasamy himself patiently enumerates many logical and sound psychological reasons to explain why "the Christian teacher or Missionary is anxious to force the pace, and to separate the child from what he considers noxious influences, so as to enable him to continue the religious enquiries in peace of mind and the best environments available."

All these and many other excellent reasons may or may not prove comforting to the bereft Hindu parents and their distressed friends. But then they have the handsome assurance of His Grace the Archbishop Dr. Mathias of Madras that "we Missionaries following the command of Christ do not believe in conversions by force or fraud, or by means of material inducements, which unfortunately many Hindus believe to be the secret of our success."

Gandhiji thinks it a virtue in himself and in his co-religionists that none of them has 'designs' on his neighbour as to his religious faith, for he regards all the great religions of the world as true—"as true at any rate for the people professing them as mine is for me." And so he thinks he must honour his neighbour's religion even as he honours his own. Gandhiji succeeds thus only in exposing the Achilles heel of Hinduism in an unbrotherly world of warring creeds. Dr. Mathias is too adroit and quick not to perceive the opening and strikes in at once with his trenchant remark that this declaration "is only an unfortunate and flippant expression of the spirit or that dreadful indifferentism so widely prevalent in these days," and ends with a counter declaration of his own faith that Christianity is the only true and possible religion. A Hindu may be admitted to be a Mahatma or great-souled man, and also loved as a very dear friend. But no Moulana worthy of his title and no Padri worth his salt can hide or keep to himself the perturbing fact that that man with his saving virtues is not really among the "saved" and stands nowhere in God's estimation when compared with the meanest sinner among the True Believers (vide Reformer of 16th February 1929, page 389.)

His Grace the Archbishop of Madras may or may not be right when he says: "We cannot confine our work to merely social service without being guilty of a grave dereliction of duty." But every man of sound business sense will agree that it is for the 'fisher of souls' not for the fish, to choose what it shall be fed upon, though the kindly Doctor of Souls is too polite to say so.

K. R.

THE GITA IN A NUTSHELL.

If the Vedas were revealed to the world through the God Brahma or through the various seers (Mantra-Drashtas), the Gita was revealed, at a more mature stage of the world, through an incarnation of God himself. This fact persuades us to think of the Gita more highly than of any other Hindu scripture. Verily it is entitled to be considered the Word of God. As such it is the Supreme Scripture of the Hindu community. What I say here is strongly corroborated by the long line of holy saints and teachers who have for the last twelve centuries or more busied themselves with the interpretation of its teaching sooner than with that of the teachings of other scriptures. No religious book has been oftener commented upon than the Gita. This fact is unmistakable recognition of its supreme importance for us.

The fundamental problems discussed by Shri Bhagwan Krishna are, to my mind, threefold: Are we to live or refuse to live? Why are we to live? How are we to live?

The first was exactly the problem with Arjuna. He was a very good type of citizen. He would sacrifice a whole kingdom rather than be a cruel citizen to kill his fellowmen, nay his own kith and kin. He was keenly experiencing the hardness of the situation when love and duty clash. He would retire from the active life of the world. His attitude was one of refusal to live.

But the Lord urged him to live in the thick of the battle of life and to be a good citizen, because, He said, the killing which he was called upon to do would not interfere with his nobleness which is a quality of thought and not of action. We are what we think not what we do. In life no strict righteousness is possible except in a good will. If we have come to possess a good will or a balanced will, we have conquered the evil of life and have attained liberation.

Thus was expounded the necessity of life. All is God's creation and He wills out of His supreme will that it be so. In the heart of all life He is the soul; at bottom he is the agent. The complex creation is a play of his will and energy. It is not possible for any one not to be. The extreme necessity of life manifests itself in an intense love of life. The most distressed soul would like to live on. Let people denounce life, but they all love to live in one manner or another. All forms of salvations are only the various views of continued life. In this God is a success like unto himself. We are vain, therefore, if we think that we can renounce or can retire. Renunciation or retirement is only an exchange of one lot with another. All lots should, therefore, be regarded as having equal grace. This is the balanced view of life which conduces to our joy of freedom. In this the Gita inculcates a form of spiritualism.

Life being thus necessary, let us know how to live. This question has already been answered by implication. Each one of us must stick to his duties which devolve upon him according to his station in life. One must not flinch from them, must fulfil them at all costs. This is the only view which promotes the equilibrium of social organization. Either from this consideration or from an appreciation of God lovingly manifesting Himself in and through us and our activities, we must always accept the joy of life and of all that it stands for.

It is vain to think that one way of life is attended with greater grace than another. Emphatically it is not so. Grace centres only in the mind or attitude. A particular activity can neither help nor hinder the attainment of God's grace. The worldly activities should be permitted to pursue their free course. The thinker, the fighter, the trader, and the labourer must each adhere to what he has adopted in agreement with his propensities. For the preservation of society this is very necessary. This principle alone can maintain and conserve social order. Only we must remember that social activities are only for the satisfaction of social needs. They are not in themselves a means of acquiring divine grace unless they are fulfilled in a divine mood. We can attain God only if we love God, ever have our hearts fixed upon Him. And this we must do. We must have a mentality of devotion, or divine love. The supreme message (Parmam Vachah) of Bhagwan Krishna is devotion. A life of devotion alone is a life of supreme perfection; but I said a 'life', which means one of activity of some sort, for truly speaking Life cannot be divorced from activity, life at bottom is activity. This is how to live.

RAM PRASAD PANDYA.

THE LEAGUE ASSEMBLY—A CONTEST OF CREEDS.

The Sixteenth Assembly of the League of Nations has been entirely dominated by the Italo-Abyssinian conflict. It has been universally recognised that infinitely more grave than the dispute between these two countries is the clash of ideas and ideals between Italian Fascism, on the one hand and the Geneva institution on the other. In short it is a contest of creeds.

With great frankness Signor Mussolini has declared his faith in his classic essay in the Encyclopedia Italiana entitled "The Political and Social Doctrine of Fascism," as the following extracts will show:

"And above all, Fascism, the more it considers and observes the future and the development of humanity quite apart from political considerations of the moment, believes neither in the possibility nor the utility of perpetual peace. War alone brings up to its highest tension all human energy and puts the stamp of nobility upon the peoples who have the courage to meet it." Again—"And thus hostile to the spirit of Fascism, though accepted for what use they can be in dealing with particular political situations, are all the international leagues and societies which as history will show, can be scattered to the winds when once strong national feeling is aroused by any motive—sentimental, ideal or practical."

Such a political creed is diametrically opposed not only to the letter, but to the whole spirit of the League Covenant and the Kellogg-Briand Pact. There is no doubt as to where the Protestant Churches of the world stand in this matter. "Any nation," declares a recent Conference of the World Alliance for International Friendship through the Churches, "which breaks its plighted word not to use other than pacific means for the settlement of international disputes will stand condemned not only by the moral judgment of human society but by the teaching and spirit of Jesus Christ." Whilst the Executive Committee of the Universal Christian Council conveyed to the statesmen of all nations "its conviction that they have the wholehearted support of the Christian Churches which it represents, in their efforts to prevent a flagrant violation of the Kellogg-Briand Pact."

The League Assembly has proved once again to be a remarkable rallying point for world public opinion. Indeed never before, in the League's history, has such solidarity been manifest. The representatives of nation after nation went to the tribune to declare their loyalty to the principles of the Covenant; and what is more, the willingness of their peoples to make sacrifices in their defence. "If the Covenant is not observed as a whole for all and by all," solemnly declared Eamon De Valera, "then there is no Covenant." Halvadan Koht (Foreign Minister of Norway) voiced a practically unanimous conviction when he said: "The events of these days will decide whether the League will be able to maintain its existence as a political instrument in international relations."

As these words are written the issue still remains in the balance. Will the League, as Signor Mussolini prophesies, be "scattered to the winds"? Will international ideals and methods be demonstrated helpless when faced with dynamic nationalism? The near future will show. All we can say with certainty is that a triumph for the conceptions of the League can only be secured at a price. What price? The League system has largely failed up till now in two vital respects. The League has not provided, as it was intended to do, an instrument for the peaceful change of the Status quo where justice demanded such change. Secondly, through lack of esprit de corps, the League has permitted both violation of treaties and the successful use of armed force upon more than one occasion.

Mutual defence and common justice—these conceptions, so different from the pre-war anarchy of balance of power, are basic in the Covenant. Both imply sacrifice, especially for the strong and for the satisfied. If aggression is to be held in check by collective pressure, moral and material, then legitimate grievance must be fairly considered and generously handled.

At a moment of grave anxiety and danger, there is real hope to be drawn from the fact that there are not wanting signs that under the stress of impending catastrophe this double lesson is being learnt.

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Oct. 26

A PRE-WAR OUTLOOK ON WORLD EVENTS.

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

In the Reformer dated October 12, you say that the Anglo-Indian press, with the one exception of the Times of India, has been consistent in protesting against Mussolini's colonial ambitions. This exception is all the more inexplicable in view of the Times of India's glorious stand in the days of India's national humiliation under the martial law administration in the Punjab in 1919.

Though the Times of India, like The Englishmen of Calcutta, had previously criticised Sir Rabindranath Tagore's famous letter to Lord Chelmsford, renouncing his knighthood, it characterised as "A Libel" General Dyer's statement before the Hunter Committee that, for what he did, he had the support of all the Europeans in India. The Times of India's protest against that statement infuriated a large number of influential Europeans. In the present case, I trust, the Times of India will yet adopt the right course, as the European planter's logic cannot have entered the Times building.

In a previous issue you noticed, with approval, the Archbishop of Canterbury's denunciation of the Italian campaign. It reminded me of Telemachus' semi-historic denunciation of the gladiatorial performances. No denunciations or protests have come so far from the Vatican. The Church has surrendered, if not sold, her spiritual power for the temporal re-possession of a few acres of land. It has been the admiration of the whole world that the Church attained her moral strength and greatness through her uncompromising and unbending attitude towards all the forces of evil. The Church on many occasions trod on the necks of mighty emperors. Incidents like the arrogant king Visvamitra standing as a humble suppliant before Vasishtha were numerous in the early history of the Church. The submission of the Roman Emperor Theodosius to Bishop Ambrose is a case in point: "When Ambrose was informed of the massacre of Thessalonica, his mind was filled with horror and anguish. He retired into the country to indulge his grief and to avoid the presence of Theodosius.....The emperor was deeply affected by his own reproaches and by those of his spiritual father; and after he had bewailed the mischievous and irreparable consequences of his rash fury, he proceeded in the accustomed manner to perform his devotions in the great church of Milan. He was stopped in the porch by the archbishop who, in the tone and language of an ambassador of Heaven, declared to his sovereign that private contrition was not sufficient to atone for a public fault or to appease the justice of the offended Deity." (Italics mine). 'Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire,' Chapter XXVII. There is not now a single Bishop in any Church who will dare incur the displeasure of a King or a Dictator, and to this extent the moral power of the Church has come down. Savonarola said: "In the primitive Church we had golden prelates and wooden chalices. Now we have wooden prelates and golden chalices."

What the modern Tamerlane Mussolini is attempting to do in Ethiopia, Napoleon did in Egypt. In his proclamation after the victory, Napoleon imposed upon the Egyptians this blasphemous order: "My name shall be mentioned in all the mosques during public prayers." All that now remains in Egypt of Napoleon's conquest is a heap of the bones of the Egyptian soldiers taken prisoners by Napoleon and by his own orders afterwards murdered by the French soldiers "as there was not sufficient food for all."

Mussolini's ambition to raise Italy to her former glory is doomed to failure, even if the other blood-thirsty nations of Europe would continue to stand still while he committed more murders and enriched himself with the "spoils of war." He may be allowed to plunder a few more lands resourceless and badly armed, but his downfall is certain. When Italy was at the height of her greatness, a Roman citizen could purchase with a copper piece luxuries which an oriental potentate might envy to possess. The glory of the world's greatest empire took wings when one evening Alaric, the king and leader of the Goths, entered Rome. The Romans had been accustomed to regard and treat the Goths as barbarians, just as they now regard the Ethiopians. When the Gothic army was let loose like wild animals in the heart of Rome, and unprintable things began to take place in every part of the Eternal City, the terror-stricken members of the Senate with one voice begged for the terms of peace. Alaric mentioned them. Overcome with fear and amazement the Roman chiefs exclaimed: "If we surrender all these, what is left to us?" "Your lives," was Alaric's reply. And Rome fell without the world falling with it.

The same fate awaits Benito Mussolini and all other cowards who oppress the weak.

THE INTERNATIONAL CONGRESS OF WOMEN, 12TH SESSION.*

The 12th Session of the International Congress of women for suffrage and equal citizenship took place in the City of Istanbul from the 18th to the 25th April 1935. The place of meeting was "Yildiz Kosk" an old palace of Sultan Abdul Hamidkhan with a lovely old—rather neglected—garden. The palace is situated on a small hill from where we had a magnificent view of the Bosphorus and a part of the city of Istanbul. In this Palace we had dressing-rooms and a hair-dressing saloon, and an exhibition of articles brought by delegates of various countries (which were sold for the benefit of the Congress). We had the press, a translation bureau, a bank with facilities for exchange, a traveller's bureau where we could arrange for tickets and passages. We also had a restaurant which supplied luncheon every day. The Municipality had given us free bus tickets for the duration of the conference. Members of the Reception Committee—our charming Turkish sisters—were women of great personality and organizing capacity. It was amazing to think of them confined, and enshrouded only a dozen years ago. How bravely they have taken their position in the world, how manifestly they organize and how great a privilege it was to get to know them intimately. Mme Latife Bekir, Mme Lamika Refik and members of their Committee did their work extremely well.

The Turkish Government are to be congratulated on their very modern outlook in life. Not only have they emancipated their countrywomen but they have realised the value of the co-operation and service of half the population of their country. The men came in large numbers to all our open sessions. Members of Government, Municipalities, and university took the keenest interest in our proceedings.

On the 15th April before the Congress was formally opened we had a press meeting where each delegation gave a short account of the work of the women of their country. India expressed a hope that her peace movement would be taken as an example by other countries. "We believe in non-violence and in service and in sacrifice rather than arms and ammunitions and military services as a means to obtain world peace."

The Turkish press was ever in attendance. All the newspapers had columns full of women's congress every day. Some papers brought out special numbers and most of them were profusely illustrated. Each one of us was photographed a dozen times a day and cards and pictures were all sold out before the end of the day.

Not content with giving us unstinted hospitality the Turkish Government even issued a set of stamps to commemorate the women's movement. For the first time in history the women have been so honoured.

Mme. Curie, Mrs. Champman Catt, Jane Adams, Salma Lagerlof and other notable women have been immortalized by this modern and novel method.

The delegates were most cordially welcomed not only by the reception committee consisting mainly of members of the Turkish women's union and progress and all their co-workers, but by the Turkish officers on behalf of their Government. There was a Turkish Boat from Alexandria which took us over at half rates and gave us luxurious cabins and food. At Izmir, we were welcomed by the Mayor and a few members of the Municipality who came to our boat to read the address and presented flowers and literatures of their great country. It was an extraordinary act of courtesy and kindness which reached our hearts and made us their friends and sympathisers even before we set foot in Istanbul. There were representatives of thirty-two countries participating in the Congress of women for suffrage and equal citizenship. Asia and Africa and South America made the union of both Hemispheres, a living palpable reality. Asia sending her women from Iran, India, Beyrout, Damascus, Baghdad, Arabia, Egypt from Africa and Jamaica from South America. It was a thousand pities that neither China nor Japan, Burma nor Ceylon were represented as we were looking forward with great interest to come into contact with Chinese and Japanese women. Egypt and India and Central Asia and Jamaica thought alike and spoke alike—had visions and ideals of the future which were identical. We felt the strength of our unity with a great surge of pride and we knew that without pacts and treaties we could rely on the unity friendship and joint actions of the women of Asia. Indeed it was amazing how the bond of womanhood cemented our friendship and united us to the woman of the West. We may have different angles of vision but in all matters of principle we had complete unanimity and our goal was the same. The declaration of principles proposed by the board on matters of Equal

1. Political rights
2. Economic rights
3. Moral rights
4. Legal rights
5. Peace and the League of Nations was accepted and ratified without a single dissenting voice.

There was no subject on which our perfect unanimity of thought was as apparent as when we were discussing the subject of world peace and Disarmament. An amendment to the Resolution suggesting that Pacifists should not be considered as traitors to their country was accepted for discussion in the Committee later on. Some countries were desirous of including a new clause to the effect that women should not be debarred from military service. We all protested that it was against our principle to work for Peace to deliberately demand the inclusion of women in that organized murder and destruction known as war.

TWO EMINENT LIVING AMERICANS.*

Among the American publicists, educators, politicians, literally hundreds of them have championed the cause of Indian Freedom and it is not my intention to write about them, but I wish to mention that two eminent Americans—Rev. Dr. J. T. Sunderland and Rev. Dr. John Haynes Holmes—have served the people of India most effectively by championing the cause of Indian freedom and interpreting Indian ideals to the American people. The well known services of Dr. Sunderland need not be discussed at length. But I must say that during the last fifty years Dr. Sunderland has been doing his best to spread the truth about India. It may be mentioned that even the late Dadabhai Naoroji and Sir William Digby owed much to Dr. Sunderland, because the latter was possibly the originator of the theory that the famine in India was not due to want of food in India but due to poverty of the people caused by foreign exploitation. Dadabhai Naoroji, Ramesh Chandra Dutt, Sir William Digby, Keir Hardy and others developed this theory expounded by Dr. Sunderland. In the field of Comparative Religion Dr. Sunderland has done signal service to India by interpreting Indian religions as well as philosophy. Dr. Sunderland has spent his time and money unceasingly to serve the people of India, because he felt that by doing so he was serving the cause of humanity. His work "India in Bondage and Her Right To Freedom" remains today the best work on India.

The people of India in general do not know much of Dr. John Haynes Holmes, the pastor of the Community Church of New York. He is a great student of Comparative Religion and is the greatest of the active religious leaders of America, noted for his liberalism and appreciation of all religious faiths. He is possibly the greatest and the most fearless advocate of Peace. During the World War he opposed America's entry and opposed War in any form in the most vigorous manner. When anti-Germanism was the prevailing thought in America, Dr. Holmes welcomed the Germans as human beings to share with him and his church-members the spirit of human fellowship. He has championed every progressive cause in the United States and upheld every movement for human freedom—Indian freedom, Philippine Independence, etc.

It is not generally known to the Indian public that Dr. Holmes was one of the first Christian pastors, who gave full recognition to the intrinsic value of the Non-Violent Non-Co-operation Movement sponsored by Mahatma Gandhi. In a historic sermon delivered in the Community Church of New York Dr. Holmes several years ago proclaimed Gandhi as "the greatest man in the world today." Since that day, he has used his efforts, through his writings and lectures, to make known the activities of Mahatma Gandhi and the All India National Congress unceasingly. In his paper, Unity, during the recent years, more has been published about India than any other paper in a foreign land.

As a public speaker Dr. Holmes is unquestionably one of the foremost in the English-speaking world; and he has used his eloquence to rouse the people of America to further the cause of justice, liberty and peace. He was one of the leaders of the movement that the ill-fated Sacco and Vanzetti should be given justice. He is now agitating that Tom Mooney who is in prison due to perjured evidence, should be freed. He is advocating that the "Scottsborough Negro prisoners" should be freed. He believes and preaches that all the Indian political prisoners in India, Germany or Soviet Russia, who are placed in jails or concentration camps without trial, should be freed. He, like the founders of the American Republic, believes that the cause of justice and human liberty should be fought all over the world.

Dr. Holmes is a truly religious man, a man of peace. War and violence are opposed to his conception of religion. For this reason he advocates disarmament and arbitration among nations. He does not hesitate to criticize his own government, when he thinks that it is following a wrong policy, endangering the peace of the world. He is one of the foremost exponents of the idea that Christianity and War cannot be reconciled. He was one of the first Christian leaders to advocate that Christian pastors should take the leadership in refusing to support any war, and furthered the recent historic meeting of Christian Ministers (held on May 2, 1935) at the Riverside Church (popularly known as the Rockefeller Church) at New York in which more than two hundred Christian ministers took the following solemn oath:—

"In loyalty to God I believe that the way of true religion cannot be reconciled with the way of war. In loyalty to my country I support its adoption of the Kellogg-Briand Pact which renounces war. In the spirit of true patriotism and with deep personal conviction, I therefore renounce war and never will I support another."

Dr. Holmes has raised his powerful voice against race-hatred, religious bigotry and political and economic imperialism. He is always for the under-dog; but he is not one who believes in the mechanistic theory of life. He lays special emphasis on the value of idealism and spiritual significance of life, which he so admirably discussed in one of his recent sermons on "Life, Death and Immortality" delivered on the last Easter Sunday. Like Dr. Sunderland, Dr. Holmes was once a Unitarian minister; but he does not believe in any special creed and sect and is truly a universalist. The following statement which is accepted by him as a declaration of faith, gives some idea of his creed:—

"Unto the Church Universal, which is the depository of all ancient wisdom and the school of all modern thought; which recognizes in all prophets a harmony, in all scriptures a unity, and through all dispensations a continuity; which abjures all that separates and divides, and always magnifies brotherhood and peace; which seeks truth in freedom, justice in love and individual discipline in social duty; and which shall make of all sects, classes, nations and races, one fellowship of men—unto this Church and unto all its members, known and unknown, throughout the world, we pledge the allegiance of our hands and hearts."

In the Rev. J. J. Sunderland and Rev. John Haynes Holmes one finds the finest types of eminent Americans and true followers of the founder of the Christian faith. Dr. Sunderland is ninety-five years of age and still vigorous and busy with his literary activities in serving humanity. Dr. Holmes is barely fifty-five years old and as a champion of human freedom, religious liberty and opponent of racial prejudice is never too tired to extend a helping hand to all seeking his co-operation. America is not a land of mere "dollar-chasers." There are many idealists in this country. If India should be proud of her Tagore and Gandhi, then the United States can justly be proud of her Sunderland and Holmes.

TARAKNATH DASS.

THE HARIJAN PROBLEM.*

The problem of Harijans is now before the public—before the towns people and the rural public, before the Government and before the thinking public who talk in terms of the nation. Mahatma Gandhi's sincere efforts in not allowing them to be separated from the rest of the Hindus, and the new attitude of Government of being no longer indifferent to their welfare as before, have made it a problem of great importance. As a result of the Poona Pact arrived at in 1932, the number of seats reserved for them in the Provincial Councils was increased from 70 to 151, and in the Federal Assembly from the present number of one nominated seat to 19 elected seats. This will give them a great lift in the national councils, and their importance cannot now be belittled, much less can they be relegated to oblivion as before.

But apart from the political side, the question has to be looked at from the social side. Apart from voting for council elections, which may come once in three or five years, it has to be considered from the human side, from the point of daily contact in the whole countryside of the so-called untouchables with the rest of our huge masses. It is a question concerning the change of mentality of crores of our villagers, who have considered it a part of their religion, to shun and almost taboo five crores of these unfortunate people without any logic. Effacement of physical untouchability has been comparatively an easy matter in towns and cities, but a tough matter in rural parts which contain 90 per cent of our people. Even supposing that the physical touch of Harijans comes to be tolerated in rural areas in course of time, it is the change in the superiority complex of caste Hindus and other people affected by contact with Hindus, that needs to be brought about as early as possible.

If once the truth is brought home to the Hindu mind that a Harijan can be and is as clean, intelligent and useful to national interests as any one else, if once the unpleasant truth is admitted by Hindus in general that we have erred and also sinned in the past in maltreating, it may be unconsciously, our own brethren, the way to reconciliation to a complete amalgamation of Harijans with the Hindu society, as much as the caste system can allow it, will not be a long one. But some people are yet loath to admit that our past conduct has been bad. They are not able to get rid of the idea that the Harijans are separate from the rest of the Hindu community. Though Bengal Hindus have the largest proportion—44 per cent of Harijans or Scheduled castes—of all provinces in India, they are yet smarting under the Poona Pact and the reservation of 30 seats for Harijans out of 80 Hindu seats. They yet believe that these 30 seats are taken away from them and given to some other race of people not their own. They refuse to believe that these seats are given to a section of their own community, who can easily be merged among themselves by kind and tactful handling. This mentality needs a rapid and complete change.

The Harijan Sevak Sangh has now been in existence for nearly three years past. It has its branches established in all provinces and in almost all districts and in some sub-districts also. A large number of whole time workers are engaged in doing ameliorative and other work of a silent kind. The work is divided in several directions—educational, social, economic, hygienic. But the Sangh's outstanding work is educational, as it believes that the future workers among the Harijans must come from among themselves, and that can be done by extensive as well as intensive education. The workers of the Sangh drive and encourage a large number of Harijan children into common primary schools. Besides, a large number of scholarships—by hundreds—is given to them for secondary and technical education. About 120 students are supported in colleges by regular monthly scholarships varying from Rs. 10 to Rs. 30. It is the ambition of the Sangh to create large number of lawyers, doctors, engineers, mechanics, tailors, carpenters from among them, who will elevate in future people who are their own kith and kin much sooner than any other agency can. No doubt it is the bounden duty, nay some compensation for their criminal neglect in the past, of the so-called high caste Hindus to continue to do their share of the work for Harijans both by voluntary efforts and by State aid.

One of the ways in which the Sangh is trying to serve Harijans is by providing them with additional sources of water supply, especially in rural parts. The Sangh not resting satisfied with the efforts made to throw open to Harijans all public wells the use of which is denied to them at present, is raising a special fund to construct wells for them, especially in dry tracts. And this year a fund of about a lakh of rupees is being collected for that purpose alone.

Let us hope that the collective effort of all Hindus and others and also the state will remove this stigma of untouchability and the thousand disabilities imposed as a consequence thereof and thus uplift not less than five crores of people of our own country of our own religion, our own kith and kin.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Can the Pope Prevent War?—"What can the Pope do to prevent this or any other war?" asked the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Westminster (Dr. Arthur Hinsley), referring to the Abyssinian conflict, during an address at a London church. "He is a helpless, old man with a small police force to guard himself, to guard the priceless treasures of the Vatican and to protect his diminutive State which ensures his due independence in the exercise of his universal right and duty to teach and guide his followers of all races. Can he denounce a neighbouring Power—a Power armed with absolute control over everything and with every modern instrument of force? It is said he could excommunicate. Yes, and thus make war with his "Dictator" neighbour inevitably, besides upsetting the peace and consciences of the great mass of Italians, with the result of a fierce anti-clerical outbreak. I have insisted, and insist again, that the Pope is expressly excluded by the secret Pact of London in 1915 from future deliberations in the councils of peace. Until he is invited to intervene by both sides, he cannot act as a judge. As an independent sovereign, he has no grounds of intervention in the present case—not even those grounds enjoyed by a member of the League of Nations to join which League through Italy's express stipulation he was not invited. The present Pope and his predecessors have made incessant and unavailing efforts to avert war."

Girl Aviators In Bengal:—The love for aviation evinced by the Bengali girls is evidenced by the fact that a number of applications are pouring in from the girl candidates for the offer announced recently of a sum of Rs. 1,000, being devoted for the training of a selected girl candidate at the Bengal Flying Club, Dum Dum. Among the applicants are one Muslim lady of an aristocratic family, six girl graduates and one woman teacher of the local College. One application has been received from Lahore also. This encouraging response has induced an anonymous donor to offer a sum of Rs. 500 to be utilised for the training of a second girl aviator. The last date for the application is October 30, 1935.—United Press.

NOTES

The Doon School:—Lord Willingdon opened on Monday the Doon School, so called, we suppose, because it stands in the town of Dehra Dun. Dehra School would sound better but Dehra has five letters while Doon (spelt with two o's) has four which is also the number of letters in "Eton" of which it is intended to be a faithful reproduction. Lord Willingdon referred to his presence at the function as a unique experience in his long career of service in the British Empire. Whether he intended this as an encouragement to prospective Donors and future Doonians or as a hint of his personal doubt about this experiment at transplantation, the remark is worth noting. The Viceroy referred to the criticisms nowadays so common of Indian Universities. He agreed that the education imparted on them was soul-less because the students there did not live in contact with life. The Doon School will, if anything, be more completely detached from the life of the country than any of the existing colleges and universities. Soul is the one thing you cannot import from abroad, and its absence in our educational system cannot be cured by borrowing one from Eton, if it has one to spare. The English Public School has also been criticised for paying too little attention to the soul and too much to the body. A master of the Eton School, Mr. Foot, wrote two articles in the Nineteenth Century some years ago on the aim and character of the education imparted there. It may be the same gentleman who has come out as Headmaster of the Doon School. One point in the article, has fixed itself in the memory. In Eton they were taught that no one should do anything which he can bully another into doing for him. Spelling, may be left to the stenographer. It should be the aim of the Etonian to boss the show and draw the salary and appropriate the credit for things well done, and leave the discredit for things ill done to the many defects of character and custom which are so obvious to Englishmen "in this country."

Unappreciated Virtues:—The virtues of this great English institution are not appreciated in nearby Scotland nor in the British daughter Dominions. They are not appreciated by the cousins of the United States. In Europe the English system is attacked, as His Excellency remarked, on the ground that boys are kept boys too long. This is not the only main or chief ground. There are other and more serious ones. Among these is one of special concern to India in the present stage of social evolution, namely, that it fosters a contemptuous attitude towards women. Sir Sankaran Nair once remarked that the English Public School man was a Turk in his attitude to women,—not of course, the present day Turk but the Turk of the pre-Revolution days. It required some courage on the part of Mr. Foot to speak in these democratic days of turning out an aristocracy even though he qualified the term by saying it was to be one of service and not, of privilege. He said, rather crudely for an educationist, that English officers who were trained in Public Schools in England were likely to favour candidates who possessed an imitation of it in individuals who applied for jobs to them. We are not sure. It is more probable that they may be inclined to resent the pretensions of Foot's men to the authentic Public School tradition. Mr. Foot is new to India. If he keeps an open mind he will soon learn that, in the conditions surrounding his enterprise, snobs are more readily raised than aristocrats of service. The Doon College is doomed to stand for some time as a monument of costly futility.

British India and the Indian States.—In our very first comment on the White Paper containing the conclusions of the Round Table Conference, which became the basis of the subsequent deliberations leading to new Government of India Act, we expressed our surprise at the total absence of any explanation of why British India should be cut up into eleven separate parts in order to form a federation with the Indian States. The Maharaja of Bikanir had declared at the first Round Table Conference that the States did not mind whether British India came in as a unit or as separate provinces. At that time and in the minds of Princes like the Maharaja, the States were to federate with British India in order to help the movement towards Swaraj: It was to be a comradely gesture. This attitude was completely perverted and in the subsequent proceedings the provinces were visualised as the great monster against which the States had to be protected. The States became the principals in the movement which originated in the demand of British India for representative, responsible government. There was bound to be a reaction and we saw a portent of this in the last Round Table's warning to "beware of the Princes." Iago suggested to Othello that Desdemona, who had deceived her father, might deceive him also. Such is the Round Table's advice to the British public with regard to Princes. Another point of view was represented by Sir Patrick Caddell, a retired official of the Bombay Government, in a paper read before the East India Association in London. He reported that in the spring of 1932, the late Maharaja Jamsaheb Ranjitsinghji of Jamnagar told him that he, Jamsaheb, did not believe that the States would last more than twenty years after Federation. Sir Patrick professed that he himself did not agree with this view as to his knowledge there was not any appreciable desire on the part of the people of the States to unite their fortunes with British India. But he gave many reasons to lead to the conclusion that neither the Princes nor the people of the States were enamoured of the idea of entering the Federation. A person in Sir Patrick Caddell's position seldom knows more of Indian thought than what he wishes to know. As for the Jamsaheb's fear for the existence of the States, he was, no doubt, thinking, first of all, of his own State. Sir Patrick advised the Princes not to be in a hurry about joining the Federation. The advice is belated and, in any case, superfluous, as both Princes and Provinces, are at present watching the trend of events in Ethiopia with more interest than the oncoming of Federation.

Plight of Christian Untouchables:—That conversion to Christianity does not improve the lot of the Depressed Classes, is the confession rather absent-mindedly made by Mr. S. C. Chatterji, Principal, Christ's Church College, Cawnpore, in his presidential address to the 29th annual Conference of the Indian Christian Association of the United Provinces of Agra and Oudh, held at Allahabad on Monday. He said: "In our own province out of a total Indian Christian population of 1,73,000 over 1,25,000 are village Christians belonging to these (untouchable) classes. Their lot is as pitiable as that of the classes from which they have come into the Christian fold. In many places they are denied the elementary human right to draw water from public wells, their children are not allowed to attend public schools and their acceptance of the Christian faith has resulted in additional social and economic disabilities being imposed upon them. On account of the political status they have been given under the new constitution, the Hindu Depressed classes have lately found a champion in Mahatma Gandhi, and various organisations have taken up the cause of their uplift. Government also have shown similar solicitude. The United Provinces Government have already made special funds available to provide special educational facilities for them. All patriotic people must welcome these humanitarian efforts. But it is a deplorable fact that even these noble efforts are tinged by political considerations and religious differences. For, one cannot fail to note that the large number of Christians residing in the villages have been entirely ignored." Dr. Solanki, member of the Bombay Legislative Council, publicly stated with reference to Dr. Ambedkar's recent advice to the depressed classes of Nasik to change their religion, that he had himself in a hasty moment adopted the expedient of conversion to Christianity as a means of relieving himself of the social disabilities in Hinduism but soon found that this was an illusion and returned to the fold which he had quitted. Mr. Chatterji, however, does not advise the 125,000 Indian Christians who find themselves in the same predicament, to adopt the obvious course of retracing their steps to the old fold like Dr. Solanki. He complains that Gandhiji and the Government of the United Provinces have ignored the Christian untouchables in their measures of uplift! If Mr. Chatterji and his friends had not encouraged hopes of bettering their material condition, not a single man of the 125,000 persons of the Depressed Classes would have gone over to Christianity for the sake of the spiritual message. What are the 43,000 Indian Christians of the better classes doing? Why do they not organise uplift work among their fellow-Christians? Mr. Chatterji's address is a blend of cringing and swaggering which does not reflect the spirit of Christianity. It is a falsehood and calumny to impute a political object to Gandhiji for his work for Harijans. If he was actuated by a political object, he would have—as we think he should have—accepted the reservation of seats for Harijans and the matter would have ended there. Instead, he took the line that he could on no account acquiesce in any arrangement which implied that the Harijans were not in every respect one with and inseparable from caste Hindus, and thus involved himself in the humiliating exchanges which followed with Dr. Ambedkar at the second Round Table Conference.

"Islam":—Islam is the latest addition to the all too few journals expressing the mind of Muslims in India through the medium of the English language. It is published in Lahore and has reached its tenth fortnightly issue. Islam advocates the formation of a League of Islamic nations. It is obvious that, though the Koran like the Vedas may be regarded as a final and complete revelation, there are bound to be various interpretations of the precepts by succeeding generations according to their needs and conditions. This is illustrated by Islam's defence of polygamy which we reproduce in another column. The general view, expressed by Muslim scholars as regards polygamy in Islam, is that the Arabian Prophet only tolerated it as an improvement on the pre-Islamic license of his people, as is proved by the condition, almost impossible of observance in modern life, which he attached to marrying more than one wife, namely, that the husband should treat all his wives with absolute and impartial equality. The explanation offered by Islam would, on the contrary, imply that polygamy was mandatory and not merely tolerated. It says that there is always bound to be a surplus of women in every community and that, if polygamy were not allowed, the surplus women will have to lead a life of prostitution. The nations which have a surplus of women are few and, even among them, it is a phenomenon largely explained by emigration. More male children are born than female except in a few groups in an unhealthy scale of economic affluence. In India, the Muslims have a chronic deficiency of women, in excess of that in other communities. Polygamy is exceptional among Indian Muslims, less than one per cent of married women having to endure or enjoy the company of co-wives.

Tardy Sanctions:—Ethiopians continue to be butchered to make a Roman holiday by thousands. Mr. Lloyd George speaking on the Italian aggression in the House of Commons, complained that the leisurely manner in which the sanctions are being deliberated, would not save a single Ethiopian life or delay Mussolini's march by a single hour. Surely, the Liberal veteran knows that the sanctions are meant not to save Ethiopia but to save Europe when the Italian Dictator, with the Ethiopian laurels fresh on his brow, thinks of avenging Caporetto which was a more recent and more disastrous defeat for the Italians than Adowa. The White races, whatever their statesmen may say, would regard the defeat of Italy by Ethiopians as a serious set-back to their prestige with the coloured races. They made a mistake in letting Japan beat Russia and many of them think that was the cause of the emergence of Japan as a great power threatening their dominance. They would like to see Ethiopia go under the Italian boot but what they dread is that the same boot may later be turned against them. It is this danger they want to avert by means of the sanctions by depriving Italy of economic advantages likely to accrue from the Ethiopian conquest. The coloured races are shrewd enough to see through the subterfuges used to mask this purpose.

Srinivasa Sastry:—The Governor of Madras unveiled a portrait of the Right Honourable Srinivasa Sastry at the Annamalai University on Thursday. The picture is the work of Mr. Nageshwar Rao of Bombay and is a speaking likeness. Mr. Rao has managed to catch and fix on his large canvass the quizzical eyes and lightly mocking smile, outward expression of a mind which has learnt, in the spirit of the Gita, to look with an equal eye on the praise and frown of the multitude no less than of the official world. At the first two Round Table Conferences, Sastry outshone the Labour Premier in eloquence and rather piqued him by his sincerity. He was unceremoniously dropped out of the third and subsequent proceedings. Sir Annamalai Chettiar, the founder of the University which bears his name, did a public service by persuading Mr. Sastry to accept the honorary office of Vice-Chancellorship. He has enhanced it by the presentation of this magnificent portrait to the University. Sir Annamalai is no longer in the good books of the Justice Party. Mr. Sastry as a Brahmin is as hateful to it as a Jew to a Nazi. Lord Erskine's association with a function which concerns the two men, is sure to cause heart-burnings in the Ministerial camp. As a sign that His Excellency intends to be above party politics, his attendance and speech at the function will be justly appreciated.

Mr. C. Vijayaraghava Charya:—With Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya, to whom Dewan Bahadur A. Ramaswami Mudaliar paid a fervent tribute a few days ago as the Indian with the greatest record of public service now among us, stands C. Vijayaraghava Charya, the octogenarian veteran of unsullied personal and public life, with an unbroken record of disinterested and fruitful work in the whole field of Indian national life. We are pleased that a movement is being set on foot to commemorate his distinguished career. Many public men of note have associated themselves with the movement and, among them, all honour to them, several prominent members of the Justice Party. This has called forth a querulous protest from "an esteemed correspondent" in the organ of the Party. The writer, who has the decency to hide his identity, does not question the greatness of Vijayaraghava Charya—he could not do it if he would. But he fears that the association of his party men in this non-party affair will have a bad effect by distracting the rank and file from the fixed idea that all Brahmins are rogues and cheats and that virtue is to be found only among those who have managed to evade a Brahmanic descent. For Acharya is a Brahmin every inch of him and he will be the last man to disown his Brahminhood to please the Madras Nazis.

The Pasumalai Schools:—The Pasumalai Institution, which has now completed ninety years of its useful career, has throughout set itself in several ways to harmonise Christian spiritual and cultural ideals with those of India. Such attempts have our warm sympathy. The Pasumalai school of missionaries does not regard mass conversions as the best form of activity for Christian teachers. They keenly realise that Christianity to become a permanent part of the Indian heritage, should be assimilated to the sentiments and traditions of the Indian people. We publish a part of the report which reached us last week.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

BOMBAY, November 2, 1935.

HINDUISM AND ABORIGINAL TRIBES.

The article on "Are the Gonds Hindus?" which we publish in this issue from the Rev. Verrier Elwin, invites a lengthy comment which we do not intend to offer at present. But there are a few salient points on which it would be unfair to him to withhold our opinion. Mr. Elwin says that whether Gonds are Hindus or not is more readily settled by reference to the latest Census Reports than to an out-of-date work like Hewitt's 'Ruling Races of Prehistoric Times.' We entirely disagree. Mr. Hewitt was Commissioner of Chota Nagpur in the early sixties of the last century when, presumably, what is called the Hinduisation of the aboriginal tribes, including the Gonds, had progressed far less than in 1931 when the last Census was taken. If even at that time evidences of an unmistakable character pointed to the Hindu origin of the Gonds, it is clearly conclusive proof that Gonds were and are Hindus. As regards Mr. Elwin's estimate of Hewitt's book, we certainly should not have commended the book to him had we thought it was all a farrago of nonsense. Hewitt is not master of a convincing literary style but we have always regarded his two volumes as a monument of research and a rich mine of material such as that on which Fraser built up his thesis in 'The Golden Bough.' Hewitt, as we remarked before, is a pioneer in Indology and it is much to be regretted that his merits have received no recognition. As Mr. Elwin attaches so much more importance to Census Reports, he will be interested to find, in Part III of the Report 1931, dealing with the Ethnography of India, that the section on Gonds by Mr. W. H. Schubert bears out the main facts mentioned in our note, and adds something further. Their wedding ceremony is of the usual Hindu type influenced by Hindu ritual. There are eleven Gotras, a peculiarly Hindu concept, among the Gonds in the tract along Lachchna. Marriage with a person of the same Gotra is forbidden—another Hindu peculiarity. The Gonds in this area are certainly the most primitive people of the tract and are regarded as the pure aborigines. Marriage is performed by a Brahmin. Some of the Gonds wear the sacred thread also. They do not eat the flesh of the cow. Bhagwan (Mahadev) is to them the great God whom all the world worships. In the face of these facts it is difficult to deny that the Gonds are Hindus. Mr. Elwin who attaches so much importance to the Census in one place, in a later part of his article warns administrators against being misled by Census returns into treating the tribes just as if they were ordinary Hindus. May we point out that, there has been a marked tendency since the beginning of this century in Census reports and other official documents to stress the differences between Hindus and the aboriginals which was totally absent in Hewitt's time? It is true that these practices are observed by the more advanced Gonds but what the more advanced do today is what the less advanced will do in course of time, in other words, it is their line of natural evolution with which interference from outside is pernicious and unwarranted. The contact of Whites with primitive races has almost uniformly been disastrous to the latter. Not only has this been the case when the White man deliberately disregarded the well-being of the aborigines but even when he worked among them with the best intentions. The Gonds can be never raised in the social and spiritual scale except through the ancient door of Hinduism. This is not to underrate the services of the Rev. Verrier Elwin and others of his type but only to warn them of the danger of obstructing the natural evolution of the forest tribes.

The official theory that the aboriginals and the Hindus are two distinct groups and that the former are gradually being Hinduised by contact with the latter, is absolutely opposed to the facts of history. The Hindu religion and civilisation was born and grew for centuries in precisely the same forest environment as that in which the aboriginals are found today. Environment, it has been said, is three-fourths of character. The common elements in the aboriginal and Hindu culture is the result of its having grown up in an identical environment. The strength of Hinduism, in fact, is that it is racy of the soil. Already in the time of the Ramayana, the same Dharma was recognised as authoritative by the Aryans as well as the tribes denoted by their totems, Monkey, Eagle, Bear and so on. Ravana himself, the great antagonist of Rama, was a devotee of Shiva and his offence, seducing a married woman, was that he violated the Dharma which was the common property of Northerners and Southerners alike. His Queen, Mandodari, is one of the seven stars of Hindu womanhood, taking rank with Sita and Savitri as a model of purity. Rama himself is denounced by the relatives of the lady, Surpanakha, who was mutilated by Lakshman at his brother's command, with having broken the law which forbids injury to women. The poet Valmiki is obliged reluctantly to acquiesce in the charge, notwithstanding his great admiration for the hero of the Ramayana. Not only that but even the Sanskrit language was evidently cultivated by the leaders of the Southern tribes, as shown by Rama's expression of admiration at the purity of pronunciation, grammar and idiom of the Sanskrit of Hanuman when he first met him in the forest of Dandaka. Sir Henry Maine pointed out years ago that one effect of British rule in India has been to stereotype fluid custom and thus arrest the natural evolution of social life. Mr. Elwin quite unconsciously is doing the same thing in trying to set up the Gonds as outside the orbit of Hindu evolution. It is true that he does not want to convert them to Christianity but the effect of his work among the Gonds, if inspired by this idea of separateness from Hindu society, will be to leave the Gonds in a state of unstable spiritual and social equilibrium. Apart from polemics, the true conception of India is that, with the exception of Muslims, Christians, Parsis and Jews, the rest of the population is Hindu at various stages of evolution.

✓ ABOLISHING UNTOUCHABILITY.

The recent declaration by Dr. Ambedkar from the presidential chair of the Depressed Classes Conference held at Yeola that, though he had the misfortune of being born a Hindu, he would not die a Hindu has created a great stir in the Hindu community. Dr. Ambedkar's utterance is the utterance of an anguished soul and his advice to the Depressed Classes to change faith is a counsel of despair. Mahatma Gandhi, on the other hand, thinks that Untouchability is on its last legs and that in a few years' time it will disappear from the Indian soil altogether. In the condition of things as they are, there is nothing whatever to warrant this optimism. Untouchability is not going to leave us so easily and so soon, and conversion of the untouchables to any other faith, though it be en masse, which it will never be, is not likely to remedy the evil. Patience and sacrifice, of the type of Mr. Vitthal Ramji Shinde, in the cause of the removal of untouchability are alone likely to bring about the desired change.

EARLY EFFORTS AT REMOVAL.

Long before any efforts of an organised character were made for the removal of this ancient evil the late Jyotiba Phule opened a school in Poona for imparting instruction to the children of the Depressed Classes. The attempt does not appear to have met with any considerable success. In the early nineties, the Prarthana Samaj of Bombay started a night school for the workingmen of these classes at Byculla and the school continued to attract a large number of students for more than a dozen years. The Samaj started three more schools for the same purpose and they all flourished for a few years. These attempts were made more with the object of improving the condition of the Depressed Classes than with the express object of removing untouchability. But they did serve their purpose and paved the way for the foundation of the Depressed Classes Mission Society of India which aimed at the removal of untouchability root and branch from the Indian soil. This Mission Society was founded exactly twenty-nine years ago by Mr. Vitthal Ramji Shinde, a Brahmo missionary and then a missionary of the Bombay Prarthana Samaj, and not by the Bombay Prarthana Samaj as is very generally believed. Mr. Shinde had studied and restudied the Census Report of 1901 only to be struck by the awfulness of the gigantic figures of the untouchable population of India and the herculean efforts that would have to be made to abolish this age-long tyranny. Another man with a less stout heart would have given up the task as hopeless but Mr. Shinde was not to be daunted. With the active sympathy of a number of his Samaj friends and practical encouragement from persons like the late Sheth Damodardas Goverdhandas and Sir Narayan Chandavarkar, he founded the Mission Society on the 18th October 1906. The Society attracted some self-sacrificing workers and monetary aid from the educated classes came in. Bombay was the headquarters of the Mission and centres of work were opened in such places as Thana, Poona, Hubli, Kolhapur, Nagpur, Amraoti, Ratnagiri, Savantwadi, Dharwar, Belgaum, Rajkot and Madras. Mr. Shinde toured the country at frequent intervals under hardships which only those in the know could understand. The result of his ten years' strenuous work was marvellous. Wherever he went, day and night schools were opened for the children and the adults of the Depressed Classes. Hostels, industrial classes and free dispensaries were started and as if by magic an awakening among the depressed classes themselves about the wrongs they lived under was created. I was in charge of the centre in Bombay and I shall narrate now, very briefly, what was done in this town and its suburbs to remove the bane of untouchability.

The headquarters of the Bombay branch were at Parel where we had two elementary schools, one for boys and one for girls, one anglo-vernacular school teaching up to the fourth standard, one industrial school in which were taught carpentry, sewing and book-binding, and a hostel which had as many as fifty inmates belonging to all the different untouchable communities in it. In the city we had three Gujarati schools, and a Marathi school in the suburb of Chembur. Work in all these schools was entrusted to very efficient teachers and the schools were kept open for the children of the caste Hindus also, if they cared to send their children to them. Ghadiali was in those days the centre of all sorts of healthy attractions—drill, scouting, lantern and other lectures, social gatherings, Sunday classes, dramas, kirtans and theistic services being the order of the day. The result was that the Depressed classes children mixed freely with the children of the higher classes and attained a status at which those who saw them were astonished. There was no talk of castes and untouchability and consequent feeling of superiority and inferiority among the inmates of the hostel and the schools. The students were smart, neat, well-behaved and anxious to learn. No one who saw them could regard them as untouchables. One day a Brahmin gentleman came to see me and asked for water to drink. I asked the boy who happened to be the nearest to fetch a cup of water for him. After he had drunk the water I asked him if he could make out the caste of the boy who had fetched the cup. "Of course, a Brahmin," said the visitor, whereas the boy was a loveable Mahar child from the Berars.

Most of the students who attended our schools were averse to any kind of manual labour though some took very kindly to carpentry and tailoring. If asked as to what they intended to do in life, they used to answer that they would like to become government servants or school masters. This perhaps is a necessary phase of thought when people begin to take to learning first: The higher classes did the same. Government service no doubt gives status and the students were right in hankering after it. Industry also brings a sense of uplift and those who became tailors and carpenters felt that they were freed from the thralldom of untouchability.

FIFTEEN YEARS OF MISSION WORK.

At Parel things went on in a smooth way and the progress achieved in about fifteen years was remarkable. In 1921 I left the mission for reasons which need not be stated here and some other workers followed suit. But the work done in Bombay and the other important centres of the Mission was very fruitful indeed. I am even now in correspondence with many of the young men who studied in our hostels. Two of the inmates have become M.L.C's; one is a Deputy Collector; two are Tahsildars; one is a practising pleader; four are doing carpentry; about a dozen are school-masters; four are engaged in tailoring; some are in government, Municipal and railway service; one was the owner of a printing-press of his own; and at least five are conducting hostels for students of their communities in the Bombay Presidency and the Berars. Here it may be noted in passing that Laxmi, the adopted daughter of Mahatma Gandhi, was an inmate of our Bombay hostel and her parents were teachers in our Gujarat schools before she left to join the Mahatma's ashram at Ahmedabad.

I have mentioned all the above facts in no spirit of self-advertisement. Whatever may be my shortcomings no one who knows me will accuse me of this vice. I was merely a lieutenant of Mr. Shinde and whatever I and the other workers of the Society did was the result of a fixed policy of work. And that policy was service and not patronage of the Depressed Classes. We knew that we members of the higher classes were guilty, consciously or otherwise, of inflicting untold wrongs on the untouchables and the only way of atoning for our sins was to serve them in a spirit of humility and love. The work done by the mission in just a few years since its inception and the awakening created by it were so great that even now, we feel that had the policy followed by us been continued unchanged untouchability would have been on its last legs by this time. Somehow there is noticeable a tendency on the part of persons who talk of Harijan uplift—persons who are not connected with the mission—to ignore the work of the Mission altogether. Far be it from me to make any insinuation, but I do feel that omission to mention the name of the Mission and of its founder Mr. Shinde in connection with the removal of untouchability is deliberate.

V. S. SOHONI.

THE PROBLEM OF UNTOUCHABILITY.

Untouchability is one of the various forms of human oppression and slavery is its content. It is present in all the countries in one form or other bearing different kinds of sanctions. In the civilised Rome where politics was predominant slavery had its political sanction. In Greece where intellect played the prominent part it had its Aristotelian intellectual sanction. In ancient India where religion was predominant it had this sort of religious sanction. And those who dream that the problem of untouchability will be solved by merely checking the ill-treatment meted out to them by the so-called touchables, are only under the influence of some sort of fetishism. It merely betrays their insincerity of purpose and the shallowness of their love for Harijans.

The oppression of Harijans involve two kinds of of slaveries, economic slavery and intellectual dependence. Their wholesale dependence for their livelihood on the caste Hindus and their colossal ignorance go to attest this statement.

Hindu society in particular is not the work of a mere religious emotion but the carrying out of an utopian plan which in an age of machineless drudgery acknowledged the necessity of the existence of a class of menials as a permanent feature of human life. Now having been influenced by the scientific spirit which is finding substitutes for the labour of the oppressed classes on one side and on the other finding ourselves as a nation, politically and economically wholly dependent, we are bound to be driven to despair and wrath when we are not able to find scientific methods to get out of the difficulties. Dr. Ambedkar is one of the victims of this ignorant despair.

Economically the seven millions of Untouchables are under the pay and protection of caste Hindus and it is preposterous to suppose that it would be possible to influence them to choose another religion against which those caste Hindus would necessarily have a more intense prejudice, without enabling them to stand economically independent. Perhaps when they are economically and intellectually independent, untouchability will automatically disappear. One cannot expect to be better treated by a person on whom one is a regular dependent simply by going to him in the name of another religion. Nor has he in his possession such moral strength with which he would be in a position to fight out his equality. From the very cradle he was brought up in an inferiority complex and in the absence of political and economic equality, he is forced to make his inferiority his social habit. Embracing another religion cannot erase the traditional memories, it alone cannot bring about a change of heart or the true equality he is in need of.

The movement for the removal of untouchability must be openly converted into a movement of complete equality and the general will of the public is always in favour of such a movement. It is obvious for one who has studied the development of human society that all oppressions are being slackened despite all the bitter attempts of the privileged few to guard them from the rebellious spirit of the oppressed. The intellectual acquisitions and moral lessons are never wasted but they are being gradually assimilated by society in due course. Society is growing steadily and during the process of that growth it can afford to leave none of its branches behind. To solve the problem of untouchability one must take pains, one must act. One must lift them as a whole by means of a scientific plan to that level where others stand. They must be reorganised into freedom and independence. The untouchable who is today an intellectual and economic slave, who is merely a ploughing and sowing machine and who is habituated to smile at insults, must be lifted from the mire of tradition and transplanted in a healthier atmosphere.

If the reformer sincerely loves the Harijan he must create conditions where he cannot but be treated with the respect any human life deserves. Mere washing of the eyes and feeding the emotions is no cure of the disease. Now the only religion which intellectuals like Dr. Ambedkar can embrace with permanent effect, is the religion of social reconstruction towards complete equality. This religion is no doubt a hard task-master but true love is always prepared for hardships. This is the only religion which enables the Harijan to live and think by himself. Let Dr. Ambedkar and his friends organise an educational movement for him and have his eyes opened. Let them agitate for better hygienic conditions for him. Let them read to them scriptures of all religions including that to which by birth he belongs. Let them enable him to think for himself and choose his own way of life. And that is the time for preaching him the advisability of changing his faith and embracing another. Otherwise to lead him now where their own likes and dislikes lead, is only to take advantage of his ignorance and pliability. This would be perpetrating an inhuman crime on helpless humanity. Dr. Ambedkar or anybody has no right to choose another faith for him unless he is able to convince him of its efficacy; and ignorant man as long as he is ignorant cannot be convinced, he can only be cheated. Amongst other societies also untouchability exists with equal vigour though in a different form. Are there not levels of living amongst Christians and Buddhists, is there no economic differentiation or class distinction amongst them? Amongst Buddhists and Christians is there the equality existing today which Buddha and Christ hoped to establish? Is a nobleman in any country unapproachable and is not a menial everywhere a virtual untouchable? This is what Shaw complained when he said that there are enough untouchables in England and had no inclination to spend time over those of India. And the position of a converted untouchable will be much more despicable. Dr. Ambedkar and his friends are angry—with whom and why?

It is but natural if they grow wild against the system under which they and the rest of his fellow-beings including the Mahatma are labouring. They must change the system and create a new one and a new life. It is patient work that is required for this and not volatile passion.

While this battle was going on between them and the perturbed reformers many half-true definitions of religion had come on the scene. One of those is that religion is the sacred relationship between oneself and God. If this is correct, religion ceases to be a social affair, confining itself to the mere individual and his development. On the other hand religion is the sacred relationship between man and man. Buddhism is a religion but it does not mention the name of God. George Santayana said Poetry when it intervenes in life, becomes religion. Religion is the process of adjusting oneself socially and individually for his spiritual expansion into the infinity. Life thus is a training-ground. And the only way of expanding oneself is by utilising all one's energies and time to lift society to a higher level and glorify the human soul. It is on this feeling and sense, of duty that the welfare, the safety of human life and the possibility of development in the future lies. To serve the oppressed and raise them to the level of a free human being is the greatest of religious duties. For that, shouldering of responsibilities of constructive service and wise action bereft of personal fancies, are necessary. Rashness and wrath are symptoms of hatred for what one does not want and not of love for what one really wants. A negative movement does not carry one very far. The society of harijans can only be rendered help by positive action of a thorough-going reconstruction, reconstruction of the whole of its environment, influenced by the highest type of religious emotion. Let the harijans be organised into an army of freedom, let the reformers offer them a scientific programme and lead them towards real freedom where they can be really happy and really equal.

"THE MOTHER OF GOD."

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

It seems that "the casual and even harsh tones in which Jesus refers to his mother jars on the Indian reader of the gospels more than anything else." In "the ordinary Jewish mind (disbelieving in the Godhead of Jesus Christ) the same critical feeling is aroused." This would be natural to the reader of the gospels when he interpreted those gospels as separated from their rightful background,—that being, the assumption of the Godhead of Jesus Christ, and His unflinching progress towards His goal, the sacrifice upon the Cross. Seen in this perspective the reason for the tone He adopts in addressing His mother and kinsfolk becomes perfectly clear. He endeavours to bring home to them the fact that though humanly speaking He was their kinsman, He was also their God. Unless the Gospel story is read with a correct understanding of its import, the greater part will remain meaningless or become misinterpreted.

ARE THE GONDS HINDUS?

"The very last thing that I should ever want to do is to quarrel with The Indian Social Reformer, but the paragraph, "Are Gonds Hindus?" (October 12) is so full of misstatements that in the interests of accuracy I feel bound to write about it.

Whether the Gonds are Hindus or not is more readily settled by reference to the latest Census Reports than to an out-of-date book like Hewitt's "Ruling Races of Prehistoric Times." The editor of this journal was good enough to let me Hewitt's book when I was last in Bombay, but I did not have the chance of telling him that I had never read such farrago of fantastic nonsense, such a portentous display of misleading information. Far from it being the fact that the Gonds are "descendents of the tribe to which Kaikeyi, mother of Bharata, half-brother of Sri Rama, belonged," they are generally called Rawanbansi, the children of Rawan, the very opposite faction. Hanuman is not the wind-god of the Gonds. Bhimsen is not regarded as their ancestor, though as the embodiment of manly strength he is widely revered among them. I have never heard of the five Gond festivals mentioned by Hewitt, nor are they given in Trench, Russell or any of the other authoritative works on the subject. The priests of the Gonds are certainly not a special class of Brahmin, but are generally drawn from the Baiga and related tribes. If I may say so, it is as shocking to find a responsible paper like the Reformer basing its opinions on Hewitt as it would be to hear that the present Bishop of Birmingham had suddenly adopted the puerile inanities of British Israelism!

I am not interested in the religious aspects of this question. To me it does not matter in the least whether a man is a Gond, a Hindu or a Christian. But on a proper answer to the question important administrative and political decisions must depend. For example, there is a Bill before the C. P. Legislative Council which proposes to apply to the Gonds the Law of Mitakshara, as interpreted in the Benares School of Hindu Law, in matters regarding succession, adoption, joint family and partition. Now, this may or may not be a valuable piece of legislation, but whether it be good or bad, consideration of it should be based on an accurate knowledge of Gond customs. But Rai Bahadur Jaiswal, the member-in-charge, in his statement of the Objects and Reasons of the Bill, claims that since the Gonds have already adopted the Hindu customs in these matters, the Bill introduces no real changes but simply consolidates existing custom. "Gonds generally believe in and talk the language of Hindu Law. Adoption is very common among them. Their living is almost on the same lines as a joint Hindu family with a manager in the father. They partition the family property just as any Hindu does."

After reading this, I went to the trouble of sending out a questionnaire to some thirty representative Gond villages to discover the actual facts. The result was surprising. Adoption, far from being common among the Gonds, is practically unknown. Their practice of partition is entirely different from the Hindu practice, and even the Hinduised Raj Gonds do not observe the Joint Family System. They do not, except in the villages surrounding the big towns, talk the language of Hindu Law. The Bill, therefore, instead of consolidating actual conditions, will introduce far-reaching changes. Science is never out of place, and a scientific knowledge of anthropology is essential for those who would legislate for the aboriginals.

"The only reliable test," writes the Reformer, "of whether a group like the Gonds is or is not Hindu is whether it regards itself as Hindu or not."

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Nov. 2

On this test, about half the aboriginals of the C. P. must be regarded as Hindus. According to the last Census, there are 4,258,707 tribesmen in the British Districts, and of these 2,287,493 returned themselves as Hindus, while nearly two million, although they had every opportunity to call themselves Hindus, stated that they were followers of the tribal religions. In the last ten years over 145,000 aboriginals have become Hinduised. The Gonds of Korea State, for example, are rapidly giving up their tribal customs in favour of Hinduism. The forest tribes of Sarangarh who ten years ago stated that they followed their own religion, have now unanimously declared for the Hindu faith.

There are some interesting remarks in the latest Census Report for the C. P. on this subject:—
“Events of recent years have led to a political movement to claim all Gonds and other primitive people as Hindus. There is a marked tendency among some tribesmen to return themselves as Hindus, whatever form of religion they may be following, with the idea of gaining social uplift. The catholic nature of Hinduism makes it very easy for aboriginals to be returned as members of the Hindu fold, and the tribesmen themselves adopt varying attitudes. For instance in Jashpur State the Pahari Korwas claim to follow their own religion, whilst the majority of the Dehari Korwas returned themselves as Hindus. In Udaipur the Oraons indignantly repudiate any suggestion that they are Hindus, and yet in Jashpur the statistics for this tribe show equal members following Hinduism and tribal religions. Some members of the Pando tribe, a typical people of the forest, living until lately principally by hunting, claim to be Hindus simply because they do not eat the flesh of the cow.”

Personally I think it is a great pity that a religious classification has been adopted. For the purposes of administration, legislation, and economic and social reform, the aboriginals constitute a distinct and separate unit, and our administrators will make a great mistake if they are misled by the Census returns into treating the tribes just as if they were ordinary Hindus. The tribesmen should be classified by blood and not by religion. A scientific knowledge of their customs and outlook is vital for the proper safeguarding of their interests. It is for this reason, and this reason only, that I have raised the question whether they should be regarded as Hindus or not.

From the religious standpoint, the adoption of Hinduism by an aboriginal is generally beneficial. Mr. Willis, I. C. S., writing twenty years ago, said, “The Paikra Kanwars are an instance of what Hinduism can do to teach primitive people social decency and self-respect, carrying with it lessons of thrift, industry and self-restraint; and what is true of the Paikras is true to a less extent of all the other component classes in the superior social stratum of the Chhattisgarh estates.” The Hinduised Raj Gond has an incomparably higher spiritual outlook on life than his Dhur Gond brother. Unfortunately, from the social and economic standpoint, the advantage is not maintained. The Raj Gond puts on a sacred thread and refuses to eat with other Gonds. He puts his women, who previously have enjoyed a position of dignity and freedom, into a semi-purdah. He refuses to let his children be vaccinated and they suffer terribly from the epidemics that periodically scourge the Gondwana. It is impossible to persuade him to take up any cottage industries because he is afraid that these may offend his new-found caste dignity.

I do hope that this article will not be misunderstood. I am writing solely in the interests of accuracy, and because I believe that it is only by insisting on the integrity of the tribes that they will get a square deal from Government or the public. I live among the Gonds and love them. I have never interfered with their religion, and when any of them ask me to make them Christians, I refuse. I think myself that it would be better for us all to adopt a similar attitude of detachment and leave their ancestral faith alone.

THE PASUMALAI EDUCATIONAL CENTRE.

The Madura Mission Sangham has just completed ninety years of educational work. The Pasumalai system consists of a High School, a Model School and a Training School. In addition to the subjects taught in ordinary schools as prescribed for Government examinations, our boys are engaged in a number of extra-curricular activities. We may mention some of them here. As a part of physical education, classes are conducted regularly in physiology, personal Hygiene, Tropical Hygiene and First Aid. Within the last year 147 boys received First-Aid certificates from the St John Ambulance Association. This doubtless enables our boys to save lives and relieve suffering of the people among whom they live. All our boys are regularly trained to sing both Indian and European tunes. Now the emphasis is on Indian music rather than European music. Music classes are thoroughly enjoyed by all our boys.

It is a well known fact that we have extensive Farms and a well equipped Manual Training school for giving training in handwork and practical agriculture. So it is unnecessary to speak of them here beyond reminding ourselves of the training they afford for the hand and the head and how they promote dignity of labour and relate school activities to life in rural parts. Our aim is much higher than preparing candidates for examination. We aim at proper blending of physical, intellectual and spiritual education. Boys are here considered more important than examinations and the results in the examination not so important as character formation. Nevertheless our results in the public examinations are on the whole satisfactory.

Our aim in imparting physical education is threefold:

- (a) To find out the special need of each student by periodical physical examination and noting his progress.
- (b) To teach him the general laws of health so that he may know how to maintain his physical and mental vigour.
- (c) To teach him how to guard the health of his community and to be of service in maintaining that health.

If a boy is found to be weak and his weight is not satisfactory Cod Liver Oil or other special nourishment is given him. We tabulate each month the physical achievement of students and there is a good deal of zest and competition in trying to improve, to educate the students in the laws of health and in seeing all conditions of living conducive to the best health of the student body.

Physical activities are regularly carried on for all classes in the school. Some time of the day is given for drill work, and there are games and sports for all after 5 in the afternoon. Our schools are taking keen interest in all inter-school activities.

The chief aim of our schools is to develop in our students Christ-like character and a spirit of service. Continued efforts are made to achieve this, through various school activities. There is a great revival in Scout activities in the year under review. The Student Christian Movement, the Y.M.C.A., the Sunday School and other religious organizations have contributed not a little to the moral and spiritual growth of our children.

This year in studying scriptural and spiritual truths we are using what is known as the "Trait Study" method with such subjects as "Truth," "Hunger for Righteousness," "Co-operation," "Brotherliness" etc. Each Sunday night about 40 leaders gather to help each other in discussing these subjects. Classes are divided into groups of 10 to 18 where discussions are informal. The special emphasis is on "doing" or living a brotherly love-filled life rather than mere studying the truth.

The hostel life has always played a large part in the experience of our Pasumalai boys. There has been a steady advance in the attempt to give into the hands of students larger responsibilities. Though they make mistakes now and then they learn gradually to carry on their own affairs under our supervision and we feel this will give the boys the right kind of preparation for their future life. All the Training school students are required to learn Indian cookery during the course of training. This stands them in good stead when they become village teachers.

Much thought has been put on giving our boys a better balanced diet in the hostels. In trying to supply the most needed animal proteins, fat and vegetable we are immediately faced with the added cost. But we are making progress slowly in those things. There is much prejudice to be overcome in giving up the rice diet that all are accustomed to. But for one meal a day our boys usually have other grains.

Our committees on physical education has given special thought to the supervision and medical inspection of all the hostels. Kitchen sanitation is carefully watched. It is to be regretted that a few of our hostels still have to put up with primitive latrines. All possible efforts are taken to keep our students interested in the social and religious welfare of the villagers. Groups of students and teachers go out during vacations and week ends to the villages around for Rural Uplift work. In village schools our training school students do practice teaching, play games, organize young men's clubs, help to start libraries and reading rooms. We use special charts and directions for teaching illiterate adults; our senior students are trying to help in the removal of illiteracy. Six of the villages in the neighbourhood have been surveyed by our students and teachers this year with a view to doing intensive village work. We have started a day school at Krishnapuram and Night schools in two villages, Palanganathan and Vilachery, where the three R's are taught to adults and children of the backward so-called untouchable classes. Talks are also given to the villagers about improving sanitary, social and economic life of the peoples. Pamphlets and booklets on rural uplift have also been distributed to the villagers. Student volunteers go on Sundays to village congregation to conduct services and hold meetings for the children. During the recent September vacation our students started Sunday schools, Christian Endeavour Societies and Night schools in these villages and also helped the village teachers in various ways.

In December 1934 200 farmers from a dozen neighbouring villages were our guests listening to lectures on improved methods of farming, observing our farms and gardens and stock in Dairy and Poultry yards and participating in the exhibition, ploughing contests and other games. Every effort is thus being made to relate our school activities with rural life and to help the villagers economically, socially and morally.

INDIANS IN ITALIAN SOMALILAND.

The following letter from a merchant trading in Italian Somaliland has been received by the Imperial Indian Citizenship Association—

About a month ago, I had learnt through the newspapers, that you had made enquiries of the Government of India regarding Indians in Somaliland. In reply it was stated that the Government of India was corresponding with London and was giving its serious attention to the question of the safety of Indians in Somaliland. But it is not known what steps have been taken by the Government of India. Though war has begun, efforts are not made to protect Indians. I had recently visited Somaliland in connection with my business there and lived from June to September. I therefore consider it necessary to bring the following facts to your kind notice.

The Indian population in the principal areas is, Magadiscio, 150; Marka, 100; and Kisinayu, 150.

These figures relate to the three places visited by me. Besides these, there are other Indians in the neighbouring localities.

There are many Indians in Eritrea and Massawa. Indians are living there with their families and children. No one hears their complaints as there is no British Consul, nor is there any place to go to for obtaining redress of Indian grievances. As the letters are censored they are unable to send out information about their miseries and troubles. Indian masons, who had gone to Massawa, are not allowed to return back. Arbitrary wages are given. They are made to work under compulsion. If they refuse to work they are imprisoned by the authorities. Nothing is produced there which may be used by Hindus for their food. Therefore, the food-stuffs are sent for from Mombasa and Aden, but merchants at these two ports are not willing to send them, as cash for their goods is not paid immediately.

They are not allowed to take away their own earnings. They are permitted to take 2,000/- liras per head only, which are not accepted in other countries. Though they may be having properties worth lakhs, they cannot take away more than 2,000/- liras. An Indian is allowed to send only 300 liras per month to India. Some of the Indians in Kisinayu and Magadiscio have sent away their children to Aden and Mombasa. Still there are many left behind as they fear that their properties will not be safe in their absence. Before their conditions become more serious, I humbly request you to make an effort to save them.

Congress Formed in London:—A meeting of Indian Nationalists, supporters of the National Congress and Socialist sympathisers formed an Indian National Congress in Britain with the object of supporting the policy of the National Congress. They decided to ban Communists and seek affiliation with the Indian National Congress. Mr. K. D. Kunrie was elected Chairman and Mr. B. B. Raychaudhuri and Mr. S. M. Telkar, Secretaries. The organisation is holding the fifth Indian Political Conference in London in the middle of November.

Rescue of Abducted Girl:—In spite of the demand of Rs. 100 as deposit with a view to restrict the number of applicants desirous of undertaking the rescue of a 15-year-old Hindu girl belonging to a rich family, who had been abducted in Burma, Rajkumari Amrit Kaur, through whom the reward of Rs. 20,000 was announced in the Press, has received 4,000 applications from young men from all parts of India offering their services. Out of these seven applicants have been provisionally selected. Security deposits amounting to over three lakhs are being returned to the applicants.

INDIA BEARING GIFTS.*

(BY PROF. GEORGE P. CONGER.)

In any attempt to appraise India, it is of course easy to look on the dark side. The country is under a foreign domination which, even at its best tends inevitably to impress upon the people foreign ways and policies dictated from outside. The land is beset by grim poverty. Its markets are curtailed, and its native crafts are threatened with extinction. Thousands of its educated young men and women are practically without hope of employment. The defects of other religions are evident enough in other lands, but the defects of Hinduism have been made particularly evident in India; the Hindus have so often failed to preserve their own best traditions and have gravitated so indifferently toward their worst, that utter ignorance, base superstitions, and appalling suffering have been the lot of millions who have had to die before ever they could know the higher life. The Muslims are in some respects in sharp contrast to the Hindus, but they have their own defects and difficulties and in many ways seem to be caught in the same general system. How can such a country have anything to give to the world? It seems at first like one of the old chenar trees of Kashmir, still stately and green to outward view and still carefully protected, but with the trunk inwardly hollow, so rotten at heart that even if it stands a few more years or decades, it must stand only to fall.

The difficulty just now with India's contribution to the world is not altogether with the giving; it is also with the receiving. Just as it takes two to make a quarrel, it takes two to make a gift. The disheartening fact is, that the other nations are just now hardly in the mood or the spirit to profit from what India brings. For some of them, an astonishingly narrow nationalism discolours the international outlook and poisons the springs of goodwill. In others, a stultifying race prejudice, sometimes so superficial that it is merely colour prejudice, parades itself insolently before the dignity and honour of the East. Even Western institutions which are free from these things are so jealous for their own forms of faith that they mistake theologies for religions and preach a superiority which they cannot practise.

But to the eye of faith, these things, in East and West alike, are on the surface. The deeper truth is that culture always is a future; like the world "nature" culture carries a suggestion of that which is about to be. When the world of humanity comes more fully to its human heritage, India among the other nations will come into her own.

What are the gifts which India brings? Let us call them four, and picture India, as in Abanindranath Tagore's painting at Sir J. C. Bose's house at Calcutta, bringing her gifts in her four outstretched hands. Let us be frank to say that these four do not make a complete life for any people; India must not merely give, but also receive. It is what any nation gives to the world that makes her doubly worthy to receive. First, India brings sustained traditions. In spite of accretions and excrescences, and even throughout the course of changes and improvements, there will always be a certain high continuity in Indian life and thought. India will always speak with her immemorial past echoing and amplifying her present words. As the West comes to know India better, part of the reverent attachment which modern Western peoples feel for the cultures of Rome and Greece will be transferred to the cognate, but still more ancient, and through the centuries better sustained, culture of ancient India. India will never be more than superficially or artificially westernized. She will become like modern China (taking for granted that China will find a way out of present difficulties) than like modern Japan, and will be content with using Western appliances without giving way to the frame of mind which such appliances too often seem to entail.

Second, India seems particularly fitted to express to the world the note of simplicity of living. In spite of profundity of mind and here and there some luxury of material things, India's millions will remain, like her saints and sages, fundamentally simple, unaffected, unencumbered. Untold millions of her people will never earn more than a pittance, and their living must always be the plain bare living of the poor. But those poor will be stronger of body and richer in mind than they now are. Free from Western artificialities, they will be able to cultivate their native arts, to live in their own ways, and much more nearly to achieve the virtues of contentment. And by a kind of human induction, the virtues of contentment, when achieved by one people, will spread from man to man and from nation to nation, imparting their religion to the tangled lines of human thought and effort. In the West, our great Bergson, looking over the world with the eye of a master, tells us that we are living in a frenzy—a frenzy which cannot go on but must give place to calmness and composure. And the Gospel of Luke says that a man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth.

In the third place, India can exemplify a certain saving detachment. This is close to what we have said about simplicity of living, but even the simplicity of the poor may be too much engrossed in its small and petty details. It is not for naught that a hundred generations of men in India have been trained to ideals of renunciation, and have learned to fix their eyes upon things not seen as yet by those around them. Under varying conditions, detachment may be a negative virtue, or even a vice. But the utter lack of it means loss of vision and where there is no vision men and nations perish.

And finally, India stands for what we may best call comprehension. This is not merely understanding, although understanding is an element within the larger comprehension or comprehensiveness which is essential to Indian life. Indian thought, to us of the West, is often vague, as the ocean is vague when seen from a great height. But Indian life is inclusive, comprehensive, with room for all forms of thought, just as the ocean has room for every current in its all-embracing unity. We of Europe and America see religion and morals through the eyes of the Semites, and we see art, and often economics and politics, too, through the eyes of the Greeks. But beyond the Persian Gulf lies India, with many a broader horizon and less restricted outlook. In some parts of America, one is regarded as anything from liberal and tolerant to dangerously broad when he fraternizes religiously with members of Christian denominations other than his own, to say nothing of Catholic Christians or of Jews. India, at her best, can furnish a gentle but powerful solvent for the narrowness and bigotry which hinder the spread of true and undefiled religion.

Essential for all this is contact, contact, contact. In all these countries, we who love these things must actively promote them. We must preach the word in season and out of season. We must so live as to wear away prejudices which cannot be removed by word or argument. Each of us must stand in his own country for that which is best in the others. And each of us must keep his interest and his courage fresh by maintaining touch with others around the circle of the lands and seas.

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

One word more about India. In Oriental imagery metaphors often shift without warning; let us go back, from the figure of India bearing gifts in her arms to the figure of India as a great tree. We said that at first sight, India seemed like an old and noble tree destined from very age and infirmity at no distant day to fall. But these gifts of India, these leaves of the tree for the healing of the nations, are no legacies from the dead or the dying. The nation which bears them cannot die; it is even kept alive partly by means of them. India, after all, is not like a chenar, but like a banyan—one of her own great banyans, whose branches are putting forth not merely the leaves of a season, but the roots of a new generation, different and yet the same. Some day the soil of the world will be more receptive than it is at present, and new life will come from undying India.

THE ETHIOPIAN CRISIS AND THE RACE ISSUE.*

(By W. E. B. Du Bois.)

No problem of race and colour need ever have arisen had there not been so wide a difference in cultural level between European and colonial peoples. The belief that racial and colour differences made exploitation of colonies necessary and justifiable was too tempting to withstand. As a matter of fact, the opposite was the truth; namely, that the profit from exploitation was the main reason for the belief in race difference. Cutting across these economic arrangements, buttressed by theories of race and colour, ran the effort of the Christian religion to spread its propaganda among the natives. The result is one of the most astonishing and baffling phenomena of modern times, one which because of the contradictory nature of the facts involved makes it almost impossible to argue about race problems. For instance, it is undoubtedly true that Christian missions were a great factor in the civilization of the African and American Negroes, and that they exercised some influence in Asia. On the other hand, there also is no doubt that industry and economic exploitation continually used Christianity as a smoke-screen to reduce the natives to submission and keep them from revolt. Sometimes the Christian workers were entirely unconscious of their role in this respect. At others, they rationalized the whole system and argued that the best thing which could happen to the poor natives was to become docile Christian workers under the profit-makers of Europe.

The War brought about a revolution of thought in regard to race relations. Japan, instead of being regarded as the exception, came to be looked upon as heralding a new distribution of world power. It was no longer considered the destiny of the white race to rule the world, but to share the world with coloured races who more and more would become autonomous. The question was, how thoroughly and how quickly they could assume self-rule. It was, for instance, generally admitted that when China got over the birth-pains of evolving a new order, she was going to be a self-ruling nation freed of white dominance. When the movement for self-rule in India became formidable, a small measure of self-government had to be granted, with the distinct promise that in the long run India would become a dominion within the British Empire. Haiti, after being occupied by the United States for twenty years, gained a nominal political freedom, though at the price of shouldering an enormous debt which will keep her in chains for many generations.

* Foreign Affairs.

Liberia was practically mortgaged to the Firestone Rubber Company after being threatened with absorption by both France and Great Britain.

Ethiopia, on the other hand, had kept comparatively free of debt, had preserved her political autonomy, had begun to reorganize her ancient polity and was in many ways an example and a promise of what a native people untouched by modern exploitation and race prejudice might do. Against the current of the new ideals strikes the programme of Italy—a programme conceived in the worse of the pre-war ideology. It accuses Ethiopia of savagery because she is not an industrialized state and because she still harbours the institution of domestic slavery, forgetting that the slavery which survives in Ethiopia has nothing in common with the exploitation of slaves through the slave trade or modern industrialism. Italy proposes openly to deprive this African people of its land, always the first step toward rendering them economically and politically helpless. This was one of the first measures taken by England, France, Portugal and Belgium to establish their economic power in Africa. In India and in China, it lies at the bottom of economic exploitation. But in most of these cases the process is hidden by legal phrase and chicanery. Seldom has it been so openly and brazenly declared as in the present case where Italy simply says that she needs the land of the Ethiopians for her own peasants.

Italy has now mobilised against Ethiopia, in spite of efforts at conciliation and adjustment. She does not disguise her intention to seize Ethiopian territory. She may not attempt complete subjugation—the inner citadel is very strong. But annexation of the plateau and economic strangulation would accomplish much that direct force cannot do immediately. All this is not pleasant reading for those who pin their faith on European civilization, the Christian religion and the superiority of the white race. Yet these are the bare facts. They might be differently interpreted and variously supplemented, yet under any form they remain a story of selfishness and short-sightedness, of cruelty, deception and theft.

The probabilities are that Italy, by sheer weight of armaments and with the complaisance of Europe, will subdue Ethiopia. If this happens it will be a costly victory, both for Italy and the White world. There will be not only the cost in debt and death, but the whole coloured world—India, China and Japan, Africa in Africa and in America, and all the South Seas and Indian South America—all that vast mass of men who have felt the oppression and insults, the slavery and exploitation of white folk, will say: "I told you so! There is no faith in them even toward each other. They do not believe in Christianity and they will never voluntarily recognize the essential equality of human beings or surrender the idea of dominating the majority of men for their own selfish ends. Japan was right. The only path to freedom and equality is force, and force to the uttermost." Nor will Italy's indefensible aggression prove to the dark peoples their weakness; rather it will point the path to strength; an understanding between Japan and China will close Asia to white aggression; and India need no longer hesitate between passive resistance and open rebellion. Even black men will realize that Europe today holds Africa in leash primarily with African troops, a religion of humility, vague promises and skilfully encouraged jealousies. One of these days the very troops by which Europe holds Africa may cease to play the part assigned them.

Italy has forced the world into a position where whether or not she wins, race hate will increase.

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Nov. 2

while if she loses, the prestige of the white world will receive a check comparable to that involved in the defeat of Russia by Japan. Black men and brown men have been indeed aroused as seldom before. Mass meetings and attempts to recruit volunteers have taken place in Harlem. In the West Indies and West Africa, despite the efforts of both France and England, there is widespread and increasing interest. If there were any chance effectively to recruit men, money and machines of war among the one hundred millions of Africans outside of Ethiopia, the result would be enormous. The Union of South Africa is alarmed, and in contradictory ways. She is against Italian aggression not because she is for the black Ethiopians but because she fears the influence of war on her particular section of black Africa. Should the conflict be prolonged, the natives of Kenya, Uganda and the Sudan, standing next to the theatre of war, will have to be kept by force from joining in. The black world knows this is the last great effort of white Europe to secure the subjection of black men. In the long run the effort is vain and black men know it.

Japan is regarded by all coloured peoples as their logical leader, as the one non-white nation which has escaped forever the dominance and exploitation of the white world. No matter what Japan does or how she does it excuse leaps to the lips of coloured thinkers. Has she seized Korea, Formosa and Manchuria? Is she penetrating Mongolia and widening her power in China itself? She has simply done what England has done in Hong Kong and France in Annam, and what Russia, Germany and perhaps even the United States intended to do in China. She has used the same methods that white Europe has used, military power and commercial exploitation. And yet in all her action there has been this vast difference: her programme cannot be one based on race hate for the conquered, since racially these latter are one with the Japanese and are recognized as blood relatives. Their eventual assimilation, the accord of social equality to them, will present no real problem. White dominance under such circumstances would carry an intensification of racial difference. Conquest and exploitation are brute facts of the present era, yet if they must come, is it better that they come from members of your own or other races?

To this question Italy is giving a terrible answer. Though the centre of the Catholic Church and the home of the Renaissance of modern culture she says flatly: "We are going to subdue an inferior people not for their good but for ours. We are going to take Ethiopia just as we took Somaliland and as England took Kenya. We are going to reduce black men to the status of landless serfs. And we are going to do this because we have the power to do it, and because no white nation dare stop us and no coloured nation can."

The moral of this, as Negroes see it, is that if any coloured nation expect to maintain itself against white Europe it need appeal neither to religion nor culture but only to force. Economic exploitation based on the excuse of race prejudice is the programme of the white world. Italy states it openly and plainly.

The results on the minds and actions of great groups and nations of oppressed peoples, peoples with a grievance, real or fancied, whose sorest spot, their most sensitive feelings, is brutally attacked, can only be awaited. The world, or any part of it, seems unable to do anything to prevent the impending blow, the only excuse for which is that other nations have done exactly what Italy is doing.

POLYGAMY IN ISLAM.*

Islam is a religion not confined to personal interests of individuals. It aims at regulating the life of a whole community and even mankind as a whole. All biological researches reveal the fact that the interests of individuals composing a race have to be sacrificed if the race is to continue. In fact, the primary function of an individual is to contribute its share towards the survival of the race even if it has to give away its own life in the performance of that function. An individual who has nothing to contribute towards racial good has no right to live. It is on this basis that the question of Polygamy should be considered.

Marriage among human beings, like sexual relations among all creation, aims at the perpetuation of the race. It is not instituted to provide means of sensual gratification merely. That is why everywhere in the Quran men are advised to enter into marital relations not only to enjoy sexual gratification but also to bring forth children.

We find that all mankind is at war among itself. Each nation is after exploiting its neighbours. Even today, after two thousand years of scientific advancement and cultural uplift of humanity, no weak nation is considered fit to live a life of liberty. It is obvious that a nation which is perpetually faced with war will have to sacrifice members of its male population in the interest of its own life. Unless the male population comprising a nation lays down its life the nation cannot survive a bitter struggle. The consequence will be that a larger number of females will be left alive than that of the males. If it is decreed that one man must have only one wife and, not more than one in any case, a large surplus of women will be left unprovided for. What are those women to do?

Under the circumstances described above there are only three courses left for a community to adopt:—

1. The surplus women should repress their sexual desires indefinitely and produce no children.
2. They should resort to sexual licentiousness without marital ties and become instead of polygamous polyandrous, in which case the responsibility for bringing up the offspring cannot be fixed on any male.
3. Men should be allowed to marry more than one wife.

Can any sane person, considering the interests of the race, justify either of the first two alternatives? In the first case terrible mental and physical torture is surely to be caused to women. Modern psychology has revealed the fact that the major cause of most of the troubles of human beings is the repression of sexual desires and, if no right channel is provided for their reasonable gratification, they are sure to cause grave harm bodily, mentally and morally. In the second case a class of professional or non-professional prostitutes will be produced with all its attendant evils.

In the third case alone will they be able, on the one hand, to satisfy their natural sexual desires and on the other to produce children to make up for the deficiency in numbers caused by warfare. There will be homes in this case where the offspring can be brought up according to the highest social standards. There will be fathers to look after the children and their mothers. There will be family life to provide a healthy environment for the fragile human infants.

Wherever there is a surplus of women, there must be provided the institution of polygamy, or, otherwise, there will spring up the abominable institution of polyandry or prostitution. Deprive women of lawful husbands, as happens in every monogamous society, and they at once resort to procure one (or more) unlawfully. Prohibit a woman from entering into legal marital relations with one man and she will if she can, go to a hundred to gratify her passions. In all those societies where monogamy is enforced by law women who cannot enter into legal marital relations enjoy the sexual licentiousness by placing their persons at the disposal of more than one man. The evils of such a life can well be imagined. According to Pitt-Rivers, polygamous institutions are of great sociological importance in their relations to other institutions "in so far as they provide the only normal and healthy means of absorbing the surplusage of women." According to the same writer "under the monogamous organization a large proportion of the polyandrous group remains permanently polyandrous and is never absorbed in marriage."

INDIANS IN TRINIDAD.

"I return to my native country happy and contented," said Mr. Ganga Bisson Maharaj, a colonial-born Indian belonging to San Fernando, in Trinidad (B. W. I.). He is a businessman there and is the fourth traveller to come to visit India from the island.

Mr. Maharaj has no grievance to ventilate against his adopted country where there are, according to his estimate, about 80,000 Indians, enjoying all privileges and rights with other people. There are, he says, Indians in the Legislative Council, and in noble professions like law and medicine, but the majority of them are agricultural people. Comparing the Indian village people with colonial-born Indians, Mr. Maharaj feels sad and says that even the poorest of the poor there has a few suits to put on and does not exist in the 'semi-naked state' as in India.

The inter-communal feeling in the island is absolutely peaceful and, although up till now they are observing social restrictions, more or less, as in India, the younger generation of Indians, according to him, are imbibing more liberal views and in course of time will not style themselves communally, but as members of the same nation. They are all particularly anxious to know all about India and want to keep themselves in touch with Indian thought and aspirations.

"Whenever any Indian traveller passed through the island, invitations come to him from all quarters, whether he happens to be a Hindu, a Muslim or Northern or a Southerner. Whenever an Indian film is shown there," he further says, "repeat shows have to be arranged and there is always unusual rush at the cinemas on the occasion." He was asked before his departure for India to come in touch with Indian film companies for carrying on the business there, but as that is not his line he proposes to do nothing in that direction.

He is happy to visit the country of his grandfather but is personally disappointed because, in spite of his best efforts, he could not locate any relation of his grandfather, his father having emigrated to the island half a century before from a place called Myira in the district of Arrah. He is a Brahman and like his father has married a colonial-born Brahman girl.

When Mr. Maharaj was in London he came in touch with Dr. Sunit Kumar Chatterjee of the Calcutta University and in his company travelled to India. Since his arrival here he has been visiting the sacred and historical places of Northern India. He saw Mr. Gandhi who in the midst of a discussion, asked him whether he knew Hindustani, to which he replied that he could not speak fluently. Mr. Gandhi has given him a message for the colonial-born Indians in the island, namely, that they should speak to their children when at home in Hindustani. Mr. Maharaj is carrying the message home.

Buddhism and Hinduism—In their search for a new religion free from the caste prejudices of current, popular Hinduism, some leaders of the depressed classes are turning to Buddhism as a probable alternative. Some Buddhist monks from Ceylon have come to Malabar at the invitation of Kerala leaders. Buddhism has the great advantage of being Indian in origin, tradition and its most sacred associations. It is not a militant religion. No drop of blood has been shed in its propagation. It is a religion of compassion for all creatures. Buddhism, moreover, has not a central authority, like the Pope of Roman Christianity, to regulate its conduct in all countries. It is a religion which every nation has adapted and can adapt to its own needs. Thus there is a Chinese Buddhism, a Japanese Buddhism, a Tibetan Buddhism. Buddhism was never ousted from India. The religion of the Bhagavad Gita, the sacred book of all Hindu sects, is the adaptation of Buddhism to the genius of the Indian people. It took over from Buddhism the rejection of the Vedic religion but, in consonance with the Indian genius for continuity, relegated it reverently to a niche in antiquity. Like Buddhism, the religion of the Gita threw its doors open to women and Sudras. In the case of women, indeed, it did so less grudgingly than Buddha himself who reluctantly admitted women to the Sangha and ordained that nuns should always receive instruction from monks. The Gita religion has also Karma as its central idea but it both widened and deepened it. Buddha taught that the effects of Karma can be counteracted only by other Karma in an endless succession of lives. The Gita showed that they could be overcome now and here, and that the motive not the act constituted Karma. Above all, it provided for the ample satisfaction of the passion for worship which is the dominant note in Indian mentality. Buddhism itself realised this defect and in Mahayana it developed a bhakti cult which spread to China, Japan and Northern Asia. What Hinduism needs is now to work out in its social structure the precepts of the religion of the Gita. It is a task which requires the co-operation of all castes including the antyajas. Instead of seeking for a new haven, antyaja leaders should join hands with Hindu social and religious reformers in making Hinduism conform to the precepts of the Gita. Thus they will be doing a great service not only to themselves but to Hinduism and humanity.

The Doon School—The opening of this imitation English Public School at Dehra Dun is typical of the blunders of British rule in this country. India has a long and highly meritorious tradition of teaching and training of youth. This is quietly ignored and set aside and a system peculiar to England and found unsuitable in every other country is sought to be planted here. It is not that it had not been tried before even here. The Chief's Colleges were supposed to impart education on the English Public School plan. These Colleges were at one time much praised by Governors and other high officials at prize distributions. Nowadays, nobody hears of them. Then, there was a school named Newington in Madras intended for the education of the sons of the Zamindars on the English Public School model. That school flourished for some years. One day the English Head-master was found shot in his bed. One of the students was charged with the crime but was acquitted. Newington soon after ceased to exist. In an article in the Nineteenth Century for February 1926, Mr. Stephen H. Foot who described himself as "a businessman turned schoolmaster" wrote: "The boy from the public school, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred is not intended or expected to be merely a clerk. He is not going to do book-keeping or short-hand or type-writing for his living. The public school boy—by his own merit if he has been properly trained, or by family influence if he has not—is intended for a managerial position. Even his handwriting is comparatively unimportant, as he will dictate nearly all his correspondence, and the shorthand typist will be responsible that there are no spelling mistakes." This would mean that in India, at least, the shorthand typist will be a more educated man than his Doononian master, a humiliating position for any self-respecting superior. Apart from that, how many such managerial positions are open to Indians, who cannot write or spell? Lord Randolph Churchill when he became Chancellor of the Exchequer, did not know what decimals meant. "What do these damned dots mean?" he asked the Permanent Secretary of the department when he submitted the figures for his first Budget. Very probably we may have ministers of this type under the Hoare scheme and the Doon School may be a very good preparation for them. In another article contributed a year later to the same magazine, Mr. Stephen Foot briefly summed up the effect of the English system as compared to the Continental, as being 'games instead of girls.' Will this apply to the Doonians also? Are girls really so much worse than games? Or does Mr. Foot mean girls in any special sense?

Christian and Muslim Imperialism:—In India it is generally assumed that Muslims find foreign rule more acceptable than Hindus. It is no uncommon thing to hear Europeans say that they understand the Mahomedan mind better than the Hindu. Mr. H. Kraemar to whose article on "Imperialism and Self-Expression" we refer in the leading article, points out that there is a similarity of outlook between Islam and Christianity (which he identifies with European Imperialism); but he argues that this may be a cause of antagonism rather than good understanding between the two. "All the religions of the East (Buddhism, Hinduism, Taoism)," he observes, "are focussed on the human yearning for deliverance from evil or from the miseries of life. They are in their essence world-denying. Islam is not so. It is vehemently world-affirming. It is really borne up by a strong theocratic conception. Of this theocracy it unblushingly holds a very secularist conception. In Islam, the absolute surrender of the servant, man, to the Sovereign, God, is inherently included in the vision of a society and a world ruled by the Law of Islam, which excludes any other Law. Islam is a very consistent form of Imperialism. The domination by peoples of a foreign religion is not only felt as politically or socially or morally hateful, it is repellent because religiously speaking, monstrous." If Mr. Kraemar looked around instead of allowing himself to be lured on by the phantom of a preconceived idea, he would have found facts which shatter his speculation. Japan, a Buddhist country (and therefore supposed to have her attention focussed on the world beyond) has come to be regarded as one of the imperialistic nations. On the other hand, Turkey, which is still Islam notwithstanding the separation of State from religion, is absorbed in her national problems and has not the least trace of imperialism in her policies. Islam everywhere is fighting for existence. To make it out to be an aggressive imperialist like Christian countries, is to fly in the face of facts. In Christianity world-affirming or world-denying?

What did Christ mean when he said, his kingdom is not of this world? These sharp categories into which the average European loves to divide up and differentiate ideas and affairs, have really no validity outside his fancy. All great religions look beyond this world. Otherwise, they will not be religions but physical sciences. All religions are opposed to imperialism of the exploiting, domineering type. The Imperialist nations have ceased to be Christian though they may continue to cover themselves with it as with a cloak. The quarrel today is not between religions. What conceivable cause of quarrel can Mussolini have with the Ethiopian Emperor on the religious ground?

Provincialism and Communalism:—Sir Mirza Ismail warned the graduates of the Annamalai University against the danger of Provincialism which autonomous provinces are likely to foster. "With the slackening of control from the centre and with the inauguration of Provincial autonomy," he said in his Convocation address, "the tendency for each province to discriminate against the inhabitants of other provinces will become more and more pronounced unless firm action is taken to discourage it from now onwards. Provincialism carried to its extreme can only spell disaster to the country at large." The duty of the graduates to inculcate a sense of unity among the inhabitants of different provinces is rendered more difficult than ever by the provisions of the Government of India Act. The same may be said of Communalism which Sir Mirza said is the other great danger that confronts the country. In this matter also the Act has accorded statutory recognition to race, caste and communal differences which had so long been kept out of Indian legislation. The position today is really much worse than it was at any time during the past. The Home Member of the Government of India, Sir Henry Craik, said in the Legislative Assembly the other day that communal antagonism was more acute now than he had known it to be during his experience of thirty-five years in India. Both as regards Provincialism and Communalism, therefore, the country is deprived of the help of the new Constitution in promoting a sense of unity and solidarity. The Universities have an almost impossible task set to them when they are required to counteract the centrifugal forces set in motion by the Hoare Reforms.

Social Legislation and the Reforms:—Mr. K. M. Panikkar contributes an article to the current Twentieth Century on "Hindu Community and the New State." He writes "whatever may be the political, economic and other shortcomings of the Government of India Act, it is clear that in the matter of social legislation, it has full and absolute power." It is surprising that Mr. Panikkar should think that the political and economic spheres are divided sharply from social life. The political and economic shortcomings of the Government of India Act will surely have the effect of making social legislation more difficult than it is under the present regime. Hindu orthodoxy making common cause with Moslem opposition to social legislation and the inertia of the States will effectually bar the way. Further, as Mr. Wedgwood Benn has pointed out in an article in the Political Quarterly, the most immediate object of politically-minded India will be to get the new constitution changed. It is extravagant to speak of the Government of India Act creating a new State. What it really does is to dissolve what was in the way of becoming a State into a number of units without any principle of coherence. Such social legislation as we have been able to secure during the last fifteen or sixteen years was mainly due to the co-operation of progressive forces throughout the country. It would be much more difficult to get social legislation passed under the new constitution. We may add that the dissolution by legislation of the joint family which to Mr. Pannikar seems to be the most urgently needed reform, unless preceded or accompanied by social legislation for relief of the poor and the aged at the cost of State as is now in force in most countries, will lead to widespread distress, misery and disorder.

America's Indian Policy:—The New Republic has an interesting article on American policy towards Red Indians. In the eighteen sixties and seventies they were settled on 155,000,000 acres of land which they were to hold for ever. Today they have only 45,000,000 acres left. The policy by which they were deprived of more than a hundred million acres of land is vividly described. Of the instruments by whom this policy of expropriation was carried out, the New Republic bluntly says: "From 40 to 60 per cent. of those who dealt with Indians were their social and intellectual inferiors." Since President Hoover's time there has been a change of policy. The process of stripping the Indians of the means of self-support, while training them to be paupers has been checked. The New Republic describes the new policy as follows: "An under-privileged but innately superior people, partly warped by long mishandling, is to enter our machine civilization as contributors, able to enjoy life, and bringing with it gifts from its own civilization and special facilities. The problem is one of education, in the sense that it includes learning self-government, management of herds, farms, minerals, forests; eventually even such services as health and direct education must be sustained by local effort and initiative, not received as blanket charities. Education must begin at home, in relation to tribal problems and needs, it must have direction, lead to responsibility and initiative, and start from the base of the Indians' own tradition, culture and pride."

American Negroes and the Ethiopian Struggle:—We published last week an extract from a striking article in Foreign Affairs by Dr. W. E. B. Du Bois, the most prominent Negro leader of the day in the United States. Dr. Du Bois for twenty-four years conducted The Crisis and is now Professor of Sociology in Atlanta University. His interest in all movements for the advancement of coloured races lends peculiar value to his analysis of their reactions to the Ethiopian War.

The Ethiopian Situation:—The news during the week regarding developments in the Italo-Ethiopian conflict has been bewildering by its contrariety. The League has been leisurely perfecting its scheme of economic sanctions against Italy and Italian troops all the time have been operating in Ethiopia supremely indifferent to the proceedings in Geneva. Side by side Great Britain which for all practical purposes is the League of Nations just at present, has put her relations with the Fascist Government on a friendly footing, Italy has accepted an invitation to the next Naval Conference in London and has nominated her delegates. The Emperor Haile Selassie has appealed to the League of Nations for a loan. The League has no money of its own and unless Britain, and France are prepared to advance it on its behalf, the Emperor's appeal must remain a formality. The Emperor seems to realise that the League of Nations on which he relied so much, is not likely to go beyond what the two predominant partners decide on considerations which concern themselves. His appeal to the United States on the radio station which American engineers have erected for direct touch between Ethiopia and the States, breathes a note of resignation. He says he does not want any one to draw the sword against Mussolini because violence and force are ancient and useless weapons for settling national differences. Does this mean that Ethiopia will allow Italy to overrun her territory without armed resistance trusting to passive resistance later to make occupation untenable?

Back to Monarchy:—The result of the plebiscite in Greece on the issue whether the country should have a monarchical or republican constitution, is over-whelmingly in favour of monarchy. This is not surprising. The Greeks voted similarly in favour of King Constantine during the War but the Allies backed Venizelos who was determined to have a republic out of compliment perhaps to President Wilson whose support was very valuable in the Peace negotiations. Greece could not, however, keep what she got through the Versailles Treaty and, when the Ataturk resisted the concessions, the Allies did not support Greece and she was obliged to make a humiliating peace. Venizelos was banished but so long as he continued to command a following the Dictators who ruled in Greece were unable to declare themselves in favour of the restoration of monarchy. Venizelos' last attempt to capture the Government ignominiously collapsed and the way was clear for the return to the form of Government which the people were accustomed to.

IS IMPERIALISM PLAYED OUT?

Foreign Affairs, the American quarterly, publishes in its October number an article headed "A critique of Imperialism," by Professor William L. Langer of Harvard University. The Professor's theme is that capitalism and commercialism are not, as is often alleged, the inspiring forces of Imperialism, which are biological and not economic in their origin. Professor J. A. Hobson in his "Imperialism: a Study" published in 1902, argued that modern imperialism had for its main object an outlet for accumulated capital. Professor Langer admits that, since the middle of the last century, certain countries, first England, then France, Germany, and the United States, have exported large amounts of capital and that the financial returns from these investments in many instances came to overshadow completely the income derived by the lending countries from foreign trade. He recognizes also that, as a general rule, the return on reinvestments in home industry was distinctly below the return from investments abroad. But he points out that export of capital had little direct relation to territorial expansion. France lent much more money to Russia, Rumania, Spain, Egypt and the Ottoman Empire. Britain had more money invested in the United States than in her colonies. Less than half of her export of capital was to other parts of the Empire. The United States put more money in the development of Canada than did England. Germany before the war had only 3 per cent of her capital placed abroad, invested in Asia and Africa and of that only a small part in her own colonies. More significant still is that Russia which was a great Imperialist Power before the war, had no capital of her own to export and had to borrow from France the money needed for her Far Eastern projects. In our own day, Professor Langer adds, two of the most outspoken Imperialist Powers, Japan and Italy, are both nations poor in capital. Whatever the urge that drives them to expansion, it can not be the need for the export of capital. Nor does the allurements of Empire arise from the commercial value of colonies as markets or plantations for the sale of goods or production of raw materials. ~~done come to be~~ ^{on the whole} ~~few colonies have~~ ^{imperialistic} ~~trading with the mother-~~ ^{even have} ~~country and many have done less.~~ ^{imperialistic} ~~The colonial~~ ^{trading with the mother-} ~~trade has always played a relatively unimportant~~ ^{country and many have done less.} ~~part in the total foreign commerce of the great~~ ^{imperialistic} ~~industrial nations.~~ ^{trading with the mother-} ~~The backward, coloured~~ ^{country and many have done less.} ~~tropical colonies, which could be more easily~~ ^{imperialistic} ~~exploited, proved difficult to develop because of~~ ^{trading with the mother-} ~~the low purchasing power of the native.~~ ^{country and many have done less.} ~~"Economically," concludes Professor Langer,~~ ^{imperialistic} ~~"we have been disillusioned about imperialism.~~ ^{trading with the mother-} ~~We have learned that colonies do not pay." Asia~~ ^{country and many have done less.} ~~and Africa are in revolt against white domination,~~ ^{imperialistic} which makes the position more difficult for the imperialist powers. They are tired of the White Man's burden and are anxious to lay it down. "Who is there in England for example," he asks, "who puts much store by the mandates?" Since the War England has allowed Ireland to cut loose and she is trying, as best as she can, to put India on her own. Ireland was not allowed to cut herself loose until the most vigorous attempts to prevent her doing so had hopelessly failed. As for India, Professor Langer's well-intentioned belief that by the new Government of India Act Britain is trying, as best as she can, to put India on her own, is, to use his own phrase, "merely wishful thinking."

Imperialism and the attitude which Christian Missions to non-European peoples should adopt towards it, is the subject of a rather laboured article by Mr. H. Kraemar in the Student World, the organ of the World's Student Christian Federation for October. It is headed "Imperialism and Self-Expression." Mr. Kraemar is not concerned with Imperialism, if it can be called such, as it finds expression in the self-governing British Dominions. To him Imperialism is synonymous with "colonial policy" which, as described by Andre Siegfried in his Amerique Latine, expresses in the first place a certain economic state of things. "A country the greatest part of whose economic activity is foreign, stimulated and nourished by foreign capital, conducted by foreign personnel, inspired by foreign enterprise, aiming at foreign interests, must be called colonial. A colonial country is in the first place a country that is in the state of imperialistic economic servitude." Political dependence upon a foreign power is generally associated with this state but, according to this definition, it is not essential to it. India under the Reforms, Egypt which has been given her independence, and Iraq whose mandate has been abandoned, are still colonial countries and, not as Professor Langer imagines, countries outside the orbit of British Imperialism. The changes in the relation to the dominant country intensify their economic servitude under the guise of greater political freedom. In fact, Professor Langer's differentiation between economic and biological motives to Imperialism has no substance in it. If France retains her colonies for the sake of the soldiers which they furnish to her Army, it is still an economic motive as, but for the coloured troops, she would have to hire them from other countries or enter into entangling alliances with the New World to avoid being submerged by a neighbouring, powerful, and growing population. Japan and Italy do not conceal the fact that it is the economic urge which is at the bottom of their imperialist expansion. The safeguards with which the new Government of India Act is loaded, show that Britain does not think that the Indian Empire is a burden to her, which it never was. War as a profession for soldiers and territorial expansion as a field for more jobs for officials, are economic motives at bottom as much as a market for manufactured goods or a plantation for supplying raw materials to industrialised and imperialist nations. Christian Missions run a grave risk of being but an aspect of Imperialism. Mr. Kraemar allows that Imperialism need not always be associated with repression. But this is only by accident and it is not the essence of Imperialism, as it should be of religious missions, to foster self-expression in backward peoples. Mr. Kraemar's observations on the philanthropic activities of Missions, are worthy of attention. Quoting Pestalozzi's saying that 'philanthropy is to cover misery with the dung of mercy,' he writes: "No human being, whosoever he may be, can show, or has the right to show, mercy to his neighbour, at least according to the Gospel. Help, service and co-operation as a means to vindicate the superiority of Christianity over all other religions, is another form of spiritual imperialism."

PLAGUE RELIEF IN BORSAD.

The end of the plague epidemic in Borsad was commemorated by a controversy between Mr. Vallabhbhai Patel who had acted with commendable promptitude in dealing with the Borsad situation, and Government officials. Each party claimed superiority for the methods put into force by its men and accused the other group of relief workers of neglecting the sufferers and of inadequate attempts at rendering help. Mr. Vallabhbhai Patel, after a couple of exchanges with the Secretary of the General Department, Bombay Government, despaired of securing an inquiry from the Government into the plague relief work at Borsad. He requested some independent friends to form a committee of inquiry. A Committee of four was accordingly formed with Mr. D. N. Bahadurji as Chairman and Mr. Vaikunth L. Mehta, Secretary, and two Doctors, M. D. D. Gilder and P. C. Bharucha, members. As a council of arbitration between the Government and a popular organisation, the Bahadurji Committee is a noteworthy appointment and Mr. Vallabhbhai could scarcely have improved on the personnel. The inquiry Committee was to report, first, whether Government charges against relief workers had any foundation, second, whether Congress complaints against official relief were sound, and, thirdly, the value of the measures adopted by relief workers in Borsad. The medical members were further requested by Mr. V. J. Patel to suggest measures preventive and curative for the guidance of volunteers. The committee was formed on August 23rd. The Bombay Government non-co-operated, consistently with their refusal to institute the inquiry. The Committee, however, conclusively show that this abstention on the official side does not render their report one-sided. The main evidence in the inquiry, says the Report, has been that of public records, from the beginning of 1932 to May 1935 which consist of all the official communications between all the Departments of Government, on the one hand, and, on the other, the District Local Board on whom mainly, according to the reviews of Administration in the Bombay Presidency, 1933, rests the responsibility for dealing with epidemics. The only issue on which the opinion of the Committee might possibly have been adversely affected by official non-co-operation, was whether Congress relief workers or officials in Borsad obstructed coordination of assistance to the distressed in the stricken area. It was also the only issue on which oral evidence was taken and, unless one is prepared to regard the entire Borsad relief work of the Congress as having been undertaken with the Bahadurji Inquiry in view, it is difficult to exonerate the officials in the district.

The experience of Quetta is still fresh in Indian minds. There is no reason for believing that had they been able to adopt a similar policy of excluding voluntary help in Borsad, Government would not have done so. On the contrary, Borsad officials refused all help from or to Congressmen in the district. Dr. Bhaskar Patel who was in charge of the Congress Plague Hospital throughout the epidemic records that the Assistant Director of Public Health, one Dr. Shiveshwarkar, refused to see plague patients in Pandoli village. Worse still Dr. Shiveshwarkar seems to have ignored Mr. Vallabhbhai Patel's offer of placing his workers at the disposal of the Health Department of the Government. But worst was the Bocharan incident when fifteen days after the outbreak of plague, the Collector of Kaira asked the President of the District Local Board what measures had been taken. We extract the following from the President's reply:—"The outbreak of plague at Bocharan was first noticed by Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel and Dr. Bhaskar Patel as early as 29th March when they visited the village and examined two patients in a locality which was found to be infected. ...The Police Patel was present but he made no report about it. Two days after...there had been two deaths and some more attacks. This outbreak was not reported even then. It was published in the daily bulletin of the (Congress) Relief Camp. No notice was taken of it although Bocharan is a pilgrim centre and prompt measures for checking further spread of the epidemic were necessary....It is to be regretted that on the 12th April the Mamlatdar took a statement from the Patel and other people to the effect that there was no plague in the village and nothing was required to be done. On the 14th April the Mamlatdar reported the outbreak to the President of the District Local Board for the first time.....The Mamlatdar thought fit to discredit the information published in the Congress Bulletin with the result that the outbreak was not reported to the authorities concerned till a fortnight after it was first noticed." The Collector of Kaira District paid a flying visit to Borsad Taluka five months after the outbreak commenced, on March 31st, and left the same day without visiting the affected areas.

The Report reveals the double failure of Government officials in Borsad: First, in coping with the epidemic and, secondly, in their relations with other workers in the field. To have rejected an offer of help from Mr. Vallabhbhai Patel, one of our ablest organisers and a man of considerable experience in municipal administration and public health, was a mistake brought on probably by an over-estimation of official capacity to cope with the epidemic. We can well understand, moreover, that officials, particularly in the districts—this seems to have been peculiarly the case in Borsad—would find difficulty in appreciating the sudden conversion to co-operation of men who were in the front rank of the civil disobedience movement. But then this difficulty should be frankly admitted by the Government and, we are sure, the public would appreciate it. The fears of the district official cannot be shared by the provincial or central governments which are armed to the teeth with emergency powers even to meet the remotest possibility. The Report of the Borsad Plague Relief Inquiry Committee is a vindication of the Congress work in Borsad. The medical members have appended a valuable note embodying their suggestions for plague relief. The thoroughness with which the workers under Sardar Vallabhbhai set about their relief operations is shown by the fact that Dr. Bhaskar Patel was in constant communication with the Director of the Haffkine Institute. It also proves the anxiety of Congressmen to sink political differences in the common effort to put down the epidemic. Valuable experience has been gained at Borsad and its fruits are made available to the public through this Report.

WHAT IS SOCIALISM ?

The suspension of the personal struggle for economic freedom is a common feature of all forms of Socialism; but it is a condition which cannot stand by itself. A theory that advocates some sort of economic equality or equal distribution of wealth must necessarily insist on an equal contribution of individuals to the commonwealth of the society. This implies the equality of ability to contribute or intellectual equality. Those who emphatically believed in the Marxian economic relationship of society, are realising through experience that human life cannot be divided into watertight compartments of economics and politics. There will always be a dissatisfaction which might one day take a serious turn, if intellectual and physical labourers are huddled under one scale. Physical labour is a necessity but it does not mean that a class of people should be reserved separately for that purpose and then looked down upon. The theory that proclaims that a barber and an artist are equals in profession is a theory that stands on sentiment and not on reason; and to say that they equally contribute to the wealth of society is an utter lie. Inequalities in a society can be removed only by true equalisation and not by mere sentimental coercion. It may be temporarily possible in a Communist state to have a poet and a barber on equal pay, where intellectuals are crushed, or to suppose they are equals in an inspired Gandhian world; but to presume that such a condition in human life can be tolerated for long is to live under an illusion. If physical labour is a necessary evil let all hands share it. If intellectual growth is a possible virtue there also let all minds share. But to divide men between superior and inferior labour is to create an irreparable cleavage and to destroy harmony in social life.

Therefore, if Socialism does attempt at an equality, it can never have it permanently by the process of coercive regimentation but by intellectual equalisation, so that all members might be able to contribute equally to the growth of social life. This can be done by dividing the working hours of every member between these two types of labour according to social necessity with due regard to individual inclinations. But this condition demands a system of education which facilitates every mind to develop its peculiar gift and through it add to the treasures of the society and an organisation which absorbs the contributions of all individual minds. Thus intellectual equality and economic equality are conditions which are inseparable. They always go hand in hand.

Then only all the members of the society will have entered the rivalry of life with equal equipment and equal opportunity, the impetus being not an artificial greed for possessions but a natural desire to grow which is bound to be awakened in every individual when there is proper intellectual training from the very beginning. The greatest factor that counts in that new competition conducted on a footing of equality, is the factor of personality which when stirred can grow by itself, amidst the free play of the released talents. And only then will society have reached the highest state of efficiency. Economic equality and intellectual training are only a means to release the dormant 'person' and on that depends the further prosperity of the society and the success of the movement of social equality.

Thus Socialism must include the release of individual talent and to achieve that end it should create in every individual a personal interest of the growth of his inner being, promising him complete intellectual and spiritual freedom. Here it includes philosophic anarchism which spoken absolutely, means complete individual freedom but spoken in terms of actual life should mean complete individual freedom within the society. For, the individual has become free simply because the society as a whole has taken upon itself all the social responsibilities which belonged to him. But it has done so only with the hope that he will allow the society to share his dreams and discoveries and that he will make proper use of the freedom given to him. It is this spiritual personal interest that is creating an emotion for Socialism in every young heart which came into contact with the truth of its possibility. No movement of society can exist by itself, moving exclusively in its interest, without any regard for the personal longings and aspirations of the individual. Nor can there be a movement for the individual as such. There can be no exclusive individual interest as long as he lives in a society. When Socialism speaks of equality, it is not the equality that exists among beggars but an equality that connotes efficiency. And to keep up the efficiency without harming the social equality it will have achieved, it should inspire the individual for personal freedom and help him in his pursuit after truth.

The chief administrator being an equal to every citizen in a socialist society, much of the responsibility of good behaviour falls on the individuals themselves. And this is another reason why intellectual training is necessary if a true socialist society should be established. An idiot cannot be a good citizen. And to share the moral responsibilities of the social state, the citizen should be highly qualified. If Socialism is introduced in a society by force, without the intelligent assent on the part of the members of that society and maintained by force, it is ever an uncertainty and the fate of the society will be changed the moment the dictator changed his mind. Marxism was a victim of an illusion when it imagined that the party of the proletariat would not have any selfish motive of class reservation. As long as it is circumstantially permissible that the ignorant members of that party might be deceived by their clever leaders, so long there is no truth in any form their movement takes. And no country can be convinced to take that risk although it may be driven to that state in conditions which yield nothing but despair.

It is only building a socialist society on false foundations, if we should base it on the class consciousness of the ignorant labouring class. It should be based on the consciousness of the society itself. And to raise that consciousness politics or dictatorship is not the method but sincere constructive work, conducted steadily, peacefully and courageously. Politics is the method of governing by that abstract body by name polity which always lives separately from the society and on the revenue supplied by it. When a socialist society aims at common proprietorship there is no possibility of gathering revenue, no place for abstract life.

A movement is one that includes both the end and the means. And unfortunately most forms of our socialist movements exclude or ignore one of the other. For a practical minded reformer it is a movement which guarantees the necessities of life and for an idealist it is a movement which promises intellectual and spiritual freedom to all members. But true socialism includes both, it is a movement of human life as a whole. The spiritual freedom of the individual is the culminating stage of the movement.

The beginning of this movement of Socialism is the beginning of the society itself. The moment the clever and physically, mighty man had begun to demand his exclusive rights, there grew the reaction and the weaker men have begun to grumble for their common social rights. Gradually the dissatisfaction gathered strength, found its leaders and found its workers. It is this dissatisfaction and spirit of rebellion that tamed the tyrant and made absolute monarchy impossible. Social improvements are gradually being made at the expense of the richer classes. Has the nobleman the same privileges he had centuries ago? At every age and throughout the human life the cause of the oppressed is being fought and there was never a suspension. Knowledge by various means has been spreading everywhere, however slow it might be, and people have begun to feel for themselves the degrading condition in which they are locked up. Every one must have felt at least once in his life, as even that porter at Sindbad's mansion, that it was unjust and even cruel that he was deprived of his legitimate rights to eat and live and think, and that it was his own slavish behaviour that was responsible for his miserable plight. On the other hand the exploiter also must have been feeling against his own actions of unjust oppression and for this, the very fact that most of the reformers come from his own class stands as evidence.

As is the case with the individual so is the case with nations. Imperialism has reached its limit. Nations like England which have enjoyed a false prestige in extensive possessions are still fighting to maintain their spirit of conservatism only to keep up that prestige. Invasions now are not so easy as in the days of past and sense of morality has grown stronger. All exploiters are found out and superficial garb of morality and messages of civilisation can not hide the motive behind. People have developed their consciousness and cannot be deceived.

So the movement of Socialism is not the invention of a revolutionary mind but it is as old as exploitation itself. Its philosophy grew not from the human mind but from life itself. Rebels and rebellions are but the external signs of that extensively growing movement and those who desire to crush it will ultimately be swept off. It is a movement of nature whose gift of intellect has been grossly abused so long. It is a movement that sprung from the heart, when the bitter oppressions and sufferings of want have stirred it until it came out and openly rebelled. Nature, numbers and time, all being in its favour, there is no power on earth that can suppress it.

And this its cosmic nature, is mostly ignored among the socialist actors of various nations. Socialism fundamentally is an international movement. And in a world where the natural resources are unequally distributed among various nations Socialism cannot be anything but that. No nation can claim the credit of having achieved socialism as long as it is not prepared to share its wealth with poorer nations and live an equal life with them. Socialism in countries which are economically independent is a mockery as long as dependent countries by their side are left to their own fate. Socialism includes and must include this international equality if it means anything to humanity.

The aim of Socialism therefore should be to cross the limitations of a nation, utilise all the natural resources distributed by nature without any regard for the artificial political boundaries of nations, for the good of humanity as a whole. If environment is made common, there will be nothing to prevent unity between peoples. If poverty will cease to exist in the realisation of economic equality, ignorance in intellectual equality, imperialism will only cease to exist in international equality. National selfishness is much more dangerous than individual selfishness. If true freedom is desired, all national rights must necessarily be relinquished in the common rights of humanity as a whole. Then only true Socialism will have been achieved.

WORKING FOR THE UNTOUCHABLES.

It is now more than three years since the Harijan Sangh for the removal of untouchability was started, but one is in the dark about the line of work it does and the progress it has made. Much money from the Tilak Swaraj Fund has been, we are told, spent on the cause of the Harijans. Much money has been recently collected for the same purpose. The phrase 'the cause of the Harijan' is a wide one but what its exact scope is, one is at a loss to know. Several Harijan Students have complained to me that though they applied to the proper authorities through the proper channel, for scholarships and monetary help for the last three years, they have not only received no help but their applications have not been even acknowledged. To be sure, lack of money which very often paralyses the efforts of many a charitable institution is not the reason why deserving students get no help. The great defect of the present-day efforts for the removal of untouchability is that they are not made in the spirit of service and that they are made by men who do not believe in the cause they profess to serve. In the days of the non-co-operation movement some wells in Gujarat were thrown open to the Depressed Classes. As soon as the movement ceased the privilege of drawing water from these wells was withdrawn. When asked why this was so, a Gujarati gentleman told me that throwing open the wells was a war measure and now that the war was over the privilege could not be continued. The fact of the matter is that the depressed classes are being made so many pawns in the political game and so long as this continues the exigencies of the political situation will continue to govern the course of action of the touchable classes. The question has to be solved on its own merits. Justice has to be done for its own sake. The Depressed Classes have naturally become impatient as all the talk of removing untouchability has so far ended in smoke. They have lost all faith in the professions of the higher classes. This faith has to be restored immediately if the Depressed Classes are not to leave the Hindu fold. All our hope in this respect lies in the younger generation who imbued as they are with the high notions of equality and brotherhood, ought to come forward to strike a decisive blow at this age-long tyranny. In the words of Lamennais "when each of you, loving all men as brothers shall act to each other as brothers; when each of you seeking your own well-being and the well-being of all, shall identify his life with the life of all, and his interest with the interest of all; when each shall be ever ready to sacrifice himself for all the members of the common family, who are equally ready to sacrifice themselves for him—most of the evils which now weigh on the human race will disappear, as the gathering mists of the horizon fly at sunrise, and the will of God will be fulfilled. For it is His will that love shall unite the shattered numbers of humanity and organise them into a single whole, so that humanity may be one, even as He is one." Nelson's exhortation "England expects every man to do his duty" may be repeated with a little alteration with a hundred-fold emphasis—"India expects every man to do his duty." Since the above was written I have perused with great interest an article by Mr. Savarkar in the Kirtaskar for November on "How the town of Ratnagiri succeeded in removing the fetters of untouchability and interdining." Although it is difficult to swallow the whole stuff without a pinch of salt, there is no doubt whatever that Ratnagiri has worked wonders in these respects. And it is all due to the fact that the work is carried on in a spirit of love and as a matter of duty. What Ratnagiri has done others can certainly do, at least attempt.

TOWARD UNDERSTANDING INDIA. *

(BY PROF. GEORGE P. CONGER.)

Last year I had the privilege of spending eight months in India, studying the philosophies and religions of that country and learning as much as I could about its life. Perhaps it may be of some value if, as one who is not much more than a beginner, I set down a few elementary points which seem to me to mark the way of understanding. They represent choices rather than discoveries, but in a situation obscured by so many conflicting interpretations, a wise choice of points of approach is of great importance.

The first point is geographical. In this respect, India is, in rather striking fashion, comparable to Europe. If we take Asia and Europe together as the continent of Eurasia, Europe is a peninsula at its western end, and India is a peninsula at its southern end. Each peninsula is a subcontinent, with a mixture of races, languages, governments, and religions. Each peninsula has records and remains of ancient cultures, among them in each case one culture which extended over the boundary lines of many present-day divisions and is still widely influential. The influence of that which we may call Sanskrit culture in India is certainly comparable with that of its cognate Latin, or Greek and Latin, culture in Europe; it would be a profound and richly rewarding study to pursue this comparison in detail. Each of the two peninsulas affords a home to more than one of the world's principal religions, although the Muslims in Europe are less important in their peninsula than are the Indian Muslims in theirs. Consciousness of racial and political unity and community, if not actually further advanced in India than in Europe, is at any rate a more living ideal.

My second point concerns morals and social conditions. If we of America would understand India, we need to remind ourselves pointedly of the obvious fact that every social system has its evils as well as its excellences. It scarcely befits an American to expose or deplore the evils of India, unless he thinks also of gangland in Chicago, the divorce merry-go-round at Reno, the false glamour of Hollywood, the long story of injustice to the Negro, and the growing bitterness of American economic conflicts. A just comparison of evils of India and America is hindered by a characteristic almost ingrained in each of the two peoples. The Indian, coming from the East, is naturally sensitive to the finer things of life, and sensitive to any failure to achieve them and to any criticism because of such failure. On the other hand, the American, coming from the West, is temperamentally less sensitive, and has often been reared to regard the essential soundness, and even the superiority, of his own civilization as beyond question. Each man in this respect needs to meet the other halfway.

It is disagreeable to think of the third point, but since none of us is to blame for it, and since sometimes it seems to lurk in the background of some awkward situations, it is better to drag it out into the light. If we of America would understand India, we must get rid not merely of the notion—this is not so difficult—but also of any lingering attitudes which here and there accompany the notion—that differences of skin pigmentation give any man cultural or spiritual prestige as compared with any other man. In the present unworthy state of the world, both within and outside India, economic, social, and political prestige is often correlated with differences of colour; one great thing which India can teach the West is the hollowness and wickedness of such distinctions. When I think of the things which really do matter in life, my heart is filled with love and reverence for the great souls, the dear friends whom I came to know in India.

Once more, if we of America would understand India, we must get away from missionary situations and missionary problems. This is not denying that if we wish to help India, the missionary point of view may be valuable; still less is it denying that there are in India many missionaries who understand Indian life with real insight and appreciation. With all this granted, I think it is of primary importance that if we wish to understand India, we should learn about it from the Indians themselves. With contacts and possibilities of contacts multiplying every day, this is becoming easier all the time. As the adherents of all the great religions come to know one another better, they find that each of the great religions has all the great ideas (and also, alas, most of the small ideas!) of the others. The differences between the great religions are differences of emphasis, and their function when they meet is that each shall help to bring out the best in the others. The Hindu's practice of the presence of God, the Muslim's flaming sense of brotherhood, the Buddhist's composed self-control, the Christian's self-sacrificing service—all these are needed in the ideal man. As the great religions meet more often and more understandingly, we must expect that there will be modifications in them and adjustments between them. There will always be border-line cases of marked attraction and conversion; converts ought to be like valence electrons, bonds between the nuclei to which they belong.

This leads to mention of another point, in which I depart somewhat from widely accepted views. I doubt if "the man in the street" in India is any more religious, or any better example of his religion, than is the man in the street in America. Practically any man in any street in either country can, if asked, state some of the essentials of his ancestral faith, and, if his conduct is examined, will be found to exemplify some of its principles. The Indian sometimes seems more religious to us, when the difference is that he is merely more Oriental. The lines of religious differences can easily be overdrawn with respect to any country; I think it is clear that they are actually sharper in India than in America, although America's treatment of the Negro, if not of the Jew, would have to be reckoned into any fair comparison. A marked difference between the religious thinking of the Indians and the Americans is that the impact of the newer scientific discoveries has been felt more sharply in America, and has led to widespread and influential liberal movements. In India, it looks as if the problems of science and religion had not arisen, but this is in part due to the fact that Hinduism is on the whole more flexible and has more quiet absorptive power than orthodox Protestant Christianity.

Almost as controversial as problems of religion are problems of politics. If we of America would understand India, we must think of the presence of Britain in India as of long standing. The British started their work in India before the days of the League of Nations and the Lytton Report, and when the international conscience was much below even its present low level. Only the most extreme partisan, I think, can deny that England has afforded India substantial and lasting benefits. But beneath all the detail of current questions and controversies, one great basic fact or set of facts seems to be fundamental and unshakable: England and India are basically and naturally incommensurable. The English liberals themselves see this. It is as if it might have been if the island empire off the east coast of Eurasia had for the past three centuries dominated the western peninsula—as if Japan had dominated Europe, Japan might have conferred great benefits upon Europe. It might have given the European Babel a common language, and might even have prevented the "first European war," or the racial conflicts in Germany. But in spite of all these things the hard fact would remain that Japan is of the East and Europe is of the West. More and more clearly, it seems to be a mistake to attempt to Westernise India.

Finally, if we would understand India, we must think of India as increasingly helping herself out of her own difficulties. Notable achievements are beginning to show—witness the brilliant administration of affairs in some of the native states, the developing solidarity and sense of brotherhood within, if not as yet altogether between, various communal groups, and the work of the beloved Gandhiji in the villages. Everyone sees that there are still formidable obstacles. We of America cannot yet see how India can help herself effectively so long as the caste system is allowed to stifle ability or cramp a person's choice of occupation, nor how agriculture can hope to prosper without sterner measures against animal pests. But the heartening fact in the whole situation is the number of Indians who, in their own ways if not in ours, are devoting themselves with utter consecration to the problems of their people. In the course of some passing to and fro in the world, I have become rather accustomed to scenes of embarkation. When we left India, our departing steamer sailed out of Bombay harbour just at midday. The passengers were the usually mixed group of all sorts and conditions of men. Most of those near me had one thing at least in common; they obeyed promptly the call to the luncheon table, which came just as we were getting under way.

It occurred to me that as I was now leaving India, in a few moments the shores of that land which had been so rich for me would be out of sight in the mist; so I made my way to the deck, to look again at the fast receding city. As I stepped out I saw something which I think I have never seen in leaving any other country. A dozen or a score of European passengers stood one by one, as if each had come by himself, without reference to the others. Each gazing at the shore, was standing quietly and seriously, somewhat as a worshipper might stand in a temple.

Homage and love and gratitude to India!

THE SPIRIT OF HINDU SOCIAL INSTITUTIONS.*

In an article on the "Caste system of the Hindus" appearing in the July number of the Hindustan Review, Prof. Gulshan Rai unravels some of the important principles involved in the system. He points out that we can gain a real insight into the system by understanding the significance of the two words 'Varna' and 'Jati.' Varna, according to him, was not a division based on colour at all, it was purely an occupational classification, and the four well-known Varnas of Brahmana, Kshatriya, Vaisya and Sudra indicated only the professions followed by the different groups. As distinguished from this was the Jati which was based solely on birth, and reflected the dislike of Indians to mix their blood with foreign elements. Prof. Rai maintains that according to the Indian social system it was the Jati that was unchangeable, not the Varna. A Jati or ethnic group classed in one Varna on the basis of profession used however to change the Varna by the change of profession; but in ancient India where the family or the community, and not the individual, was the social unit, such changes used to be effected not by an individual's passing from one Varna to another but of the whole family or community doing so. Thus while the Jati of a group remained fixed, it rose or fell in the social scale in accordance with the change in the occupation of the people belonging to it.

Prof. Rai points out that it was through the institutions of Jati and Varna that all the pre-Muslim invaders of India were absorbed by the Hindu society. The foreigners for sometime after their invasion used to be soldiers and administrators, and thus occupied the rank or Varna of Kshatriyas, although they might not be recognised as such by the indigenous Kshatriyas. But when they lost political powers, they were compelled to adopt other professions, and according to the professions they adopted, they became sub-divisions of different Varnas, these sub-divisions of each Varna having marriage relations only among themselves and not with other sub-sects of the same Varna. Thus the foreigner gradually and imperceptibly got absorbed in the indigenous social organisation, but at the same time through the institution of Jati which is often identified now-a-days with sub-sect, the conservative elements safeguarded themselves from intermixture of blood with foreigners.

From these observations regarding Jati and Varna and the manner in which they helped the indigenous population to absorb foreign invaders, Prof. Rai proceeds to consider how Hindu society can in future absorb Muslims and Christians who have till now stood outside Hindu social system. He says: "If in olden times our culture was adopted by other races, it was not adopted by individuals, but by families and groups of families. This group of families formed an endogamous unit of its own. It constituted a separate Jati, which after a few generations formed a sub-section of an Aryan Varna. The present-day method of individual conversion or Suddhi is therefore repugnant to Hindu way of thought. If we failed in modern times to absorb foreign races, it is due to two reasons. So long as the Muslims ruled the country, they held a kind of political importance which prevented them from sinking to the level of other peoples in the land. This Muslim political supremacy was not overthrown till about 200 years back which barely constitutes six or seven genera-

During these two centuries, India was overtaken by dark ages, and she passed through a period of civil wars, bloodshed and disturbances. Peace and tranquillity have been established only during the last one hundred years, which means hardly three or four generations. We have had no time during this period to study our social problems and find a solution for them. But one thing is clear. Western method of conversion will not do. The one most important lesson that was learnt in connection with the Suddhi movement of the Malkana Rajputs, was that you could not re-convert them unless you assured them that they could be taken by their caste biradaries. This is a clear verdict against individual conversion. If we are to reabsorb those whom we have lost and absorb amongst us fresh foreign elements, which are not very numerous, we should reject the Muslim and Christian missionary methods, and revert to our ancient well-tried national methods. That method consisted in distributing the alien elements in one population into our pre-existing economic groups in accordance with the natural affinity of each foreign ethnic unit. This task has to a very great extent been already accomplished. The next step would be taken when the Hindu religious leaders take up the work of studying foreign non-Aryan religions, and then after a comparative study of these different faiths and methods of worship, come to find out how these different principles could be reconciled, and a synthetic whole created out of them. This process was started by men like Kabir, Nanak and others, but it was stopped by the disturbed period that intervened. This work should be re-started. The old Hindu religion sticking to its old fundamental principles, has from time to time assumed new shapes. We have absorbed the culture and religion of the Pre-Aryans. We have absorbed the most important principles of Jainism and Buddhism. We have probably absorbed the cults of the Central Asian invaders. I am sure we will also absorb those principles of Islam and Christianity, which are best suited for Indian conditions. When we have done that, it would be time to absorb even culturally the foreign elements we now have amongst us. But it will take a few generations more, if we begin the task in right earnest now. How all this is to be done must be left not to the bigoted Pandits and Mullahs of to-day but to the intelligent students of comparative theology."

Prof. Rai's suggestions are no doubt very profound and thought-provoking, and deserve the serious consideration of all well-wishers of Indian culture. We however feel that Prof. Rai overlooks one important fact. Muslims and Christians are not like the Yuchis, Huns and other hordes from Central Asia. The latter had no culture of their own and the religions they professed were very primitive with no universal appeal in them. It is comparatively easy for a higher culture like that of the Hindus to absorb such people. But the case of Muslims and Christians is quite different. They, especially the Muslims, have a long-standing and historic culture of their own, and the religions they both profess have a deep spiritual appeal and are buttressed by powerful organisations. Moreover they are religiously self-conscious, jealous and aggressive, and are out to swallow what they call the unbelieving population in this country. Would it not be necessary to make radical changes in the old methods in order to meet the entirely new situation? We for our part believe that no attempt at absorption can succeed unless the social outlook of the modern Hindu broadens and his allegiance to the essential principles of religion becomes deeper.

SYNCRETISTIC TENDENCIES TODAY.*

(BY THE REV. L. P. LARSEN)

For the last forty years a type of Indian religious teaching has been spreading in the West. In the beginning it was generally spoken of as Neo-Hinduism; and the work of spreading these ideas was for some time limited to America. Now these activities are better known by the name of the Ramkrishna Mission, and are not confined to the New World only. A report was recently published of the promising work done within the last year in several countries on the continent of Europe.

The basis of all the work of the Ramkrishna Mission is the conviction that all religions are fundamentally one, this statement being primarily applied to Hinduism and Buddhism, Islam and Christianity. When men come close enough to each other to get behind the words and forms which at first are felt to be barriers and causes of conflict, the underlying unity of longing and striving, of need and of aim, becomes increasingly clear. Those who have never been intimately acquainted with the people of any other religion or Church than their own are not troubled by questions of this kind. It is only when different religionists come close enough together, and begin to know each other more intimately, that syncretistic ways of thinking begin to suggest themselves. And they are not prompted merely by growing acquaintance and better understanding. There is also behind them a stronger consciousness of the harm that has been caused in human lives by religious conflicts.

One does not necessarily agree with syncretistic teaching because of the fact that one realises what forces have been at work in it. But it continues to be true that error lives only by the element of truth that is in it. And syncretism, as we meet it so strikingly in the work of the Ramkrishna Mission, has in it elements of truth which we cannot afford to ignore. We must come to understand one another better where disturbing and harmful differences are felt. Ignorance is a poor foundation for friendliness; but it is also a very regrettable ground for conflict and strife. Those who have come to know at close quarters some of the activities of the Ramkrishna Mission in India cannot fail to think of them with respect and admiration, even if it is not possible to answer satisfactorily all the questions one is thereby forced to consider.

Among the Hindus, such elastic and comprehensive attitudes in religious questions have from very old times been common phenomena; and one can see, in a measure, why it has been so. But it is not from Hinduism alone that syncretistic activities are at present proceeding. The Bahai Movement has grown up within the world of Islam. Its followers may not be regarded by orthodox Muslims as real followers of Islam, just as some strictly orthodox Hindus would doubtless shake their heads at the Ramkrishna Mission type of Hinduism. But the Bahai Movement in its own way, just like the Ramkrishna Mission in its way, is trying to offer to torn and distracted humanity a religious way which all may follow, a way where differences are not felt to be a source of sufferings and loss. And there are men in many parts of the world who listen to the Bahai teaching because they are tired of quarrelling with others over their religious differences.

Recently word has come from India of an address given by a great representative of Burmese Buddhism to representatives of orthodox Hinduism on the essential unity of Buddhism and Hinduism. The close connection between these two systems is a plain historical fact. And the question of the connection between them recently became more prominent, when the place that is associated with the memory of Gautama's enlightenment, after being managed for many years by the Hindus, was given back again to the Buddhists. The presence of Rev. Ottama from Burma as president at the meeting of the Hindu Mahasabha had doubtless more of political than of religious motives behind it. And it has not by any means been approved by all Hindus. Yet it is characteristic of the strong present-day tendency to overlook religious differences.

But is not this tendency something that we all have reason to respect and to rejoice at? Do we not need to strengthen all the forces that make for friendliness and co-operation among men? If it is such things as these that are meant by syncretism, will it then not be a serious matter if Christianity in all its missionary activities thinks of it only as an error and a danger? That is what some people are seriously feeling.

And is not the Apostle Paul, they may add, pointing us in the same direction when he speaks of his being "a Jew to the Jews and a Greek to the Greeks" as a necessary condition of his being able to do aright the work he has been sent to do?

When we know the man who said this, there is no room for doubt that he did not thereby wish to describe a shapeless and wobbly life, that had no character of its own, and could be entirely different things in different places. That was not the kind of man the apostle Paul was or strove to be. It is plain that what he is describing in these words, as a necessary qualification of a messenger of Christ's Gospel, is the mind that is anxious not to be an outsider or a stranger among the people to whom he wants to commend the Gospel. He realised that the work which Christ's servants are sent to do can succeed only if the hearers look upon them with such confidence and openness of mind as are nowhere shown toward those who are regarded as foreigners.

It was a desire of the same kind that made the Saviour use the name, "the Son of Man," about Himself. It is very striking that His disciples never used it about Him, though He called Himself constantly by that name. There were many things that made Him different from those around Him. It was not the kind of differences which separates the white foreigner from the people of India. But the differences were not less real; and they were not less liable to put a distance between Him and those around Him. But unless men came to Him with free and open and confident mind which only among our own people, He knew not get the truth of God commended hearts and consciences. Therefore He uses this term, and when the apostle says, "I am one of you, the Son of Man," a Jew to the Jews and a Greek to the Greeks, it is a matter that has nothing to do with the words refer to a very important. But it is a question, not of the method, but of the way by which alone we can reach "the conscience of every man."

And on this side the work of Christian missions has had such great defects that it is not strange if some are inclined to give all their attention to avoiding the danger on that side of the path. And all the fear of syncretism—which we do not wish to minimise—must not be allowed to lessen our desire to get so close to the people among whom we are to work, in mutual understanding and frankness and confidence, that the way is open from heart to heart. For then only does it become possible to commend the truth to every man's conscience.

It is a serious matter that the work of evangelism has been done by "foreign" missions. As long as we are foreigners in the eyes of the people, we are not fully qualified to prepare the way of the Lord. The messengers of the Gospel must be so near to the people to whom they wish to proclaim it that the feeling of foreignness disappears. For that calls for, if not definite opposition, at least cautious reserve, and where that prevails the way to the conscience is blocked. To be a Jew to the Jews and a Greek to the Greeks is everywhere a vital question to the evangelist.

"MOTHER OF GOD".

To,
The Editor,
The Indian Social Reformer.

Dear Sir,

In your issue of October 19th you suggest that the attitude that Jesus took toward His mother jars on the Indian reader more than any thing else. I wonder if you have really looked at the matter fairly.

The treatment Jesus accorded to women was of the highest. He built a basic equality into the very social structure when He said that one man and one woman should be true to each other in the marriage relation till death parted them. This basic equality of man and woman was announced at a time when in East and West polygamy was the general rule and practice. This was symptomatic of his general attitudes towards women. If therefore He treated His mother harshly it would have cut across this whole tenor. Did He?

The accusation is that He used the word "woman" when addressing his mother. But in accusing Him at that point we only accuse ourselves and reveal our class-filled thought. We have made a distinction between "woman" and "lady," and between a "man" and a "gentleman." This we have done because of our class-filled minds. Then when Jesus uses the word which we have emptied of respect we accuse him of rudeness. But suppose He never emptied that word, suppose He knew nothing higher to call a man than just a man, and no higher term to call a woman than just a woman. When we see the infinite respect He put into human personality of even the lowest we can understand that he filled the term man and woman with such respect that to call one by these names, with His content in them, was to compliment them and not be rude to them. He was cleansing society from the insincerities of high-sounding complimentary terms. We are slowly coming round to His point of view, for the highest complimentary we can say of any one is, He is a man, or, She is a woman. We Christians are not offended whom Pilate says, Behold the man! We think it is a compliment.

It is true that the second part of the sentence which He uses to His mother at the marriage feast, "Woman, what have I to do with thee, mine hour is not yet come" does seem harsh. But only when viewed out of its context. He was beginning His ministry. He had been true to the family obligation for thirty years. He must have been used to following the directions of His mother. But when she undertook now, when He had come before the world in a new role, to tell Him what to do, He must be decisive that the Kingdom claim had transcended the family claim, and that He was to be directed by His Heavenly Father and not by his earthly mother. She tried to force Him to use His power. She touched a tender spot. That power could only be used under Divine direction. Satan had suggested the use of it and was turned down. Herod the king did the same.

and was met with a terrible silence, and when His mother tried to do the same she was rebuked and rightly so. This power would be used in behalf of human head under the direction of the Divine and could not be at the beck and call of human pressures. That the mother felt the justice of the rebuke and that she did not take offense can be seen from her answer, "Whatsoever He saith unto you do it." In this answer she as much as said, "My Son is right, you listen to Him, and do what He says."

The other incident when He used the term "Woman" was at the cross, when He said to His mother, "Woman, behold thy Son" and, "Son, behold thy mother." In these words He commended His mother to the care of His disciple John. It is unthinkable that He could have meant disrespect to His mother at an hour like this when He was tendering to her His greatest concern and affection. The use of the word "woman" here must have been in line with the exposition we have been giving, namely, that He knew nothing higher to say to His mother than this beautiful word woman, this word which He had filled with a glorious and tender content.

Had Jesus been disrespectful to His mother and to His family would she and they have been in that company of His disciples, waiting, in compliance with His command for the gift of the Holy Spirit on the Day of Pentecost? The end of the whole thing is that she and they were in that line of obedience alongside of the rest of the disciples. The account says: "All of these with one mind continued earnest in prayer, together with some women, and Mary the mother of Jesus, and His brothers." Had they found in His treatment of the mother and of them what His critics profess to find would they have been there as full-fledged, committed disciples of His, waiting for the Holy Spirit in obedience to His command? To ask such a question is to answer it.

There is one other incident which seems harsh on the surface. It is when His mother and His brethren came to speak to Him when the multitudes were about Him. He replied, pointing to the multitude around him, "Who is my mother and who are my brethren? Behold my mother and brethren. He that doeth the will of my Father in heaven the same is my mother, and my brother." Here again is the same asserting of the family claim against this larger claim of the Kingdom. For they came to make not merely a friendly call on Him, but to take Him away, to take him away from the career of healing and saying and finally dying for the cause which he had launched. It was therefore a really critical moment. And he had to assert this universal family claim over against the smaller and more exclusive one. This same clash comes to anyone who would be brother to the sons of the earth. Very often the exclusive family claims try to stop one and make one fit into the blood-family claim and its narrow notions. That had to be broken in His own interest and in the interests of others. We are grateful that He did it.

To sum up: Because He was compelled to adjust in right relationships the claim of the blood-family and this universal family of the Kingdom of God, and because He had to keep back His mother from a managerial capacity in relationship to His use of Divine power, and because He used the word "woman," is no reason why we should judge Him adversely at this point, for in every point He was right. The Kingdom claim is supreme over the family claim, the family interest must not decide the use of Divine power, and the term "woman" and "man" which He used are the highest terms which can be used of any woman or man. Humanity is slowly but surely coming to His idea of what constitutes a compliment—the highest compliment is to say that a man is a man, and a woman is a woman. In all these things He was right—as always.

Yours etc.

[This letter comes to us without the usual authentication with the writer's name and address. We nevertheless publish it as it concerns a question of interpretation of an ancient document. Eva Gore Booth in her 'Psychological and Poetic Approach to the Fourth Gospel' tried to explain this 'stumbling block' away by suggesting that the original admitted of a more acceptable meaning. Montefiore's remark which we quoted from the Hibbert Journal disposes of this explanation. As a scholar to whom the Hebrew idiom is a heritage, and as a warm admirer of Jesus as the greatest man of his own race, his authority on a question of this kind is unique. Our correspondent's theory that the mother and brothers (or cousins) of Jesus were his disciples, is totally opposed to the evidence of the Gospels themselves. See also Mrs. Borden's study of this question in her story 'Mary of Nazareth.'—Ed., I. S. R.]

MRS. PITT OF CAMBRIDGE.

(FROM A CORRESPONDENT).

Penukonda gave a quiet though a hearty welcome to Mrs. Pitt at the railway station when she arrived by the Bangalore passenger on the morning of Saturday, the 2nd. November. It is 8 years since she came here on a short visit. Her heart always linked to Penukonda, she had to stay away at Cambridge all along to attend on her aged mother to the end of her life which event occurred 10 months ago. Being thus freed from the duty of love, she now returns to India for good to live and die, as she is fond of saying.

Mrs. Pitt's connection with South India began more than half a century ago when she came out as Miss Isobel Poole with her uncle the late Mr. Buyers, Ry. Construction Engineer, then stationed at Penukonda (1836) in charge of laying out of what is now Guntakal-Bangalore chord line of the M. S. M. Railway. Handsome in appearance, cultured in mind and gentle in nature she attracted the attention of late Mr. Pitt, a young civilian, then working as Head Assistant Collector of Penukonda about the early nineties whom she married. The happiest period of her life was spent here which to her is full of sweet and enduring memories and which she continues to cherish even to this day. That accounts for her yearning to come away leaving those near and dear to her yet left in her mother country to pass the rest of her life here.

During these 40 years and more she has steadily striven to enter into the spirit of the country and its people with a sympathetic understanding which few could evince. The first item of discipline to which she submitted herself was to learn the Telugu language of which she had acquired a fair working knowledge using it largely for her correspondence with a host of women friends she made to keep in touch with them. She was perhaps the pioneer in this out-of-the-way place 40 years ago to endeavour to create a mutual understanding by social intercourse between the two races.

She has always been a believer in the social reform movement, the beginning of which in South India may be said to have synchronised with her setting in life. Varied are the achievements in this field to her credit. She has been instrumental in inducing many a young widow to choose the teacher's vocation for a living. Many a poor school boy has received help from her hands. A great lover of children she used to gather them and impart instruction combined with entertainment by noval devices. In befriending the poor and the needy, in attending upon the sick and the suffering and in her kindness to animals, her activities have been for long an object lesson to those among whom she has chosen to live.

and work. Her earnestness to understand the people set her to examine and get a discriminating insight into their spiritual basis for which she has an undisguised appreciation. Many a Hindu recluse has found his element in coming into contact with her to the advantage of both. What is more, she misses no chance to interpret what is best in Indian culture as she sees it to those of her own race by writings and talks. She has had the advantage of coming into contact with eminent Indians like Messrs. Candeth, Gokhale, Natarajan, Sree Sreenivasa Shastry, Kesava Pillay, S. V. Kamamurthy and Sir Sankaran Nair. Indian students of the early generation who went for higher studies to Cambridge always found in her a friend in need and instances have not been few when she played the guardian to many such at the request of their parents. To go in quest of sorrow and distress and to relieve it has been almost a second nature with her.

An ardent conservative in politics, she belongs to the type which intensely feels proud of the country's achievement in the direction of Indian uplift but that the work is not complete. It is the impatience and anger at the growing radical school of thought which is steadily awakening to the belief, right or wrong, that behind all this apparent beneficence, there is a strong under-current of economic exploitation which the new constitution aims at perpetuating and which has to be arrested if the country is to be saved from grinding poverty. Most innocently oblivious to this view-point, Mrs. Pitt's love for India has deeper foundations making her weep sometimes in bitterness at the scaffolding being pulled down by profane hands thoughtlessly before the task is done revealing the political edifice of her vision in all its glory.

CHILD MARRIAGE—THE EXTENT OF THE EVIL.

The evil of child marriage is often said to be quantitatively small and the custom not universal; but even if the number of child widows revealed in these figures is one-hundredth of the actual figures, no humanitarian public or Government will wait a moment before preventing the source of this misery. In this connection let us also remember that for most of these children re-marriage is impossible.

Another consequence of child marriage is the number of young mothers who die in child-birth. 2,00,000 deaths in child-birth is the yearly average for India. This works up to 20 deaths per hour, and a vast number of these deaths occur to girls in their teens. According to Sir John Megaw, "of every 1,000 young mothers 100 are destined to die in child-birth before they cease having babies." We have no accurate figures for maternal mortality. It is estimated at 24.5 per thousand for India whereas it is only 4.5 for England.

Lastly, child marriage affects not merely the mother but the child and therefore the race. In India out of every 1,000 children born, 181 die. This is the average; there are places in India where the average goes up to 400 per 1,000. The very backward condition of India in this respect is evident by a comparison of figures for infant mortality in England and Japan which are 60 and 124 per mille respectively. The horror is indeed great when we remember that the evil is a preventable one and it is the lack of an educated social conscience which has allowed the evil to flourish unchecked.

NOTES

Inadequacy of Dominion Status:—The Reformer has consistently pointed out the unsuitability and inadequacy of Dominion Status as the goal of Indian Swaraj. The reasons for which Ireland feels she can not be a Dominion apply to India. And there are other reasons. Dominions are daughters of the mother country. India by reason of age alone would be her grandmother. But there is some thing more than age. By reason of her history extending over many centuries before the establishment of British rule, she has inherited affinities and sympathies to which as a British Dominion she can not give expression. The whole country feels keenly for the present plight of Ethiopia. A contributor to the Hindu of Madras quotes from Western writers to the effect that Ethiopia was colonised from the mouths of the Indus, in pre-historic times. Behind the sympathy felt in this country, there may be the buried memory of ancient kinship. However that may be, the fact is that, notwithstanding the intense feeling among us, we are utterly powerless to express it by any little act which may be within our means in our own name and as of our own right. Take again, the present deplorable relations between Japan and China. Two eminent scholars from these lands, now or recently in India, have declared that India is held in high esteem in their countries for the spiritual and cultural benefits derived in ancient times. India, China and Japan constituted a single cultural unit and was known as San Goku. In our own time, Dr. Hu Shih, father of Chinese Nationalism, has founded and is directing the Crescent Moon Society and the Crescent Moon Magazine dedicated to the memory of Dr. Rabindranath Tagore's visit to China. Professor Tan Yun-Shan, in his eloquent and learned lecture delivered at Shantiniketan and published in the current Modern Review, said: "As for the Poet's ideal and hope to unite Asiatic cultures and to revive the Indian and Chinese cultural relationship, all of our Chinese scholars have the sincerest sympathy with him; and our leading scholars and leaders have also cherished for long the same idea and are willing to co-strive for the common goal with joint endeavours. Now is the time for India and China to resume and strengthen their cultural relationship." Professor Yone Noguchi, the famed Japanese Poet, who arrived in Calcutta on Sunday spoke of Japan's friendship for India through Buddhism. India is thus historically cast for the part of mediator between these two great countries but she can not fill that role except as an Asiatic nation acting on her own impulses and instincts. Indian Swaraj will be a poor thing if it does not leave her full freedom to serve the world as peacemaker which her genius and history mark her out to be.

The Depressed Classes and Hinduism:—We publish on another page a striking statement by Mr. M. C. Rajah who represents the depressed classes in the Legislative Assembly, on the suggestion thrown out by Dr. Ambedkar at Yeola that these classes should quit Hinduism as a protest against the disabilities to which they are subject. Mr. Rajah's attitude on the relation of Hinduism to untouchability has been consistent. He has refused to associate the Hindu religion with the caste prejudice against untouchables and has persistently urged that it is the duty of the latter as of caste Hindus to work to abolish this institution. He has by his attitude won over many indifferent caste people who have been touched by his loyalty to their religion. His suggestion is the same as what we made last week that the leaders of the antyajas should make common efforts with Hindu reformers—they are themselves such—to remove this and other customs which hamper national progress. We are glad that, according to last reports, Dr. Ambedkar himself has somewhat resiled from his peremptory position as defined at Yeola. He rightly thinks that untouchability is an incident of the caste system. Where there are castes there will be outcastes. Even among antyajas there are castes which will have no intercourse with each other. The abolition of this system which has its roots deep down in the Indian mentality, is a work requiring time and infinite patience. Its complete extinction will come only when the average educational and economic condition of all castes, is raised to an approximately uniform level; and when the spirit of nationalism overpowers all sectarian differences and distinctions in the intense pursuit of a common goal. Meanwhile, caste prejudices are being reduced. The change during the last ten or fifteen years has been amazing. Men like Dr. Ambedkar, Mr. Rajah and others are regarded by Hindus as their own leaders in all matters except the narrow circle of those which concern the intimate relations of family life. The temple entry question was exaggerated out of all proportion to its intrinsic importance. Temple worship is not essential to Hinduism. Nobody loses caste by not going to temples. Even those who were opposed to the Temple Entry Bill, realise that access to public places and institutions should be made free to all castes. The Kavitha incident came upon us as a complete surprise. Dr. Ambedkar's impatience has also served a good purpose. We trust that the controversy will now end and that the temporary rift may be the means of drawing caste Hindus and the scheduled castes closer together. They need each other.

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

India's Contribution to Civilisation:—Mr. M. S. Aney, leader of the Democratic Swaraj Party which was formed two years ago to fight the Communal Award, presided at a conference of the Party at Chalisgaon last Sunday. In a vigorous presidential address, he insisted that the Party must continue to function in order to keep the Congress leaders from slipping into acceptance of the Award which he denounced as anti-national and unjust. He criticised the inconsistency of inviting Indian States' subjects to join the Congress and to participate in its activities in British India, and then disowning any obligation to help them to achieve reforms in their own administrations. He condemned the fantastic new constitution adopted last year for the Congress and urged its amendment immediately with a view to unite all persons and parties in opposition to the Hoare Constitution "whether they believed in the efficacy of the use of khadi or not." The khadi qualification for serving the country, keeps many people who have no differences with the Congress from identifying themselves with it. Nothing but vested interests stands in the way of its repeal. Swadeshism has taken root in the public mind but, even though khadi propaganda has been carried on most vigorously for the past several years, there has not grown up the same feeling in regard to the use of hand-spun, hand-woven cloth. In fact, the experience so far gained confirms the conclusion reached by students of the cotton industry that hand spinning can not become a permanent feature of Indian industries, unless the manufacture and import of mill yarn is prohibited by law, which is impracticable. In one respect, an important one, too, Mr. Aney showed himself to be a nationalist of the narrow, self-regarding type. He went out of his way to attack Babu Rajendra Prasad for declaring in a recent speech that the attainment of Swaraj for India through non-violent methods would be India's contribution to world civilization. He criticised this statement as placing undue stress on the means as distinguished from the end as leading one to suspect that the Congress was engaged not in an anti-British fight but in making an experiment, with the good of humanity all over the world, as its objective. Does Mr. Aney want India to become a nation like the nations of Europe with one hand on the throats and the other in the pockets of one another? What good will that do to India? How would it profit us if Britain leaves only to have Italy or Japan pounce on the country, as they are sure to do in their frantic search for colonies and raw materials? Attainment of Swaraj by non-violent means would mean its attainment for ever, not against any other nation but for the good of all. This is perfectly plain to our mind. The measure of India's worth even to herself is exactly the extent of her worth to the world.

Nationalism and Islam:—In an article published in the current number of the Modern Review, Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru asks, with reference to Sir Mahomed Iqbal's theory of the solidarity of Islam, how it is affected by the growth of nationalism in Turkey, Egypt, Persia, Afghanistan, Iraq, and, probably also, Arabia. The question, he observes, is relevant even for a non-Muslim. For on the answer to it depends the political, social and economic orientation of Indian Muslims and their reactions to modern ideas and thought currents. He adds: "Islam being a world community, its policy must also be a world policy, if it is to preserve that sense of solidarity." The report of the proceedings of the first Conference of European Muslims held in Geneva of which we reproduce a part from Islam of Lahore, is even more suggestive of the weakening of pan-Islamism which bulked so largely in Indian and European politics before the War. It is not generally known that there is a considerable Muslim population in the Balkan States who do not enjoy any special rights as a community. The Geneva Conference passed a special resolution thanking the Czechoslovakian Government for the specially favourable treatment accorded to its Muslim subjects. The French delegate complained of the treatment of its Muslim subjects by France. French policy is one of assimilation. It does not recognise race, colour or creed. The eminent Negro publicist, Du Bois, from whose comprehensive review of the position of coloured races in Foreign Affairs we quoted a part in the Reformer (November 2), thus described the policy in French colonies: "The French put forth every effort to make it possible for educated and ambitious natives to be absorbed in the French nation. Contrary to the British custom, the French schools are not blind alleys which prevent natives from going too far in education, but are articulated with the French University system.....At most this liberty means a chance for the few that can take advantage of it; but they are very few, and the result is mainly to drain off and Frenchify the native leadership of the blacks. This class of educated natives becomes a part of the ruling French caste." European Muslims who are acquiring a continental outlook, naturally dislike this. The Conference passed a resolution appealing to the League of Nations to secure for European Muslims protection of their cultural interests. From nationalism to continentalism may mean a reaction against the former and towards universalism as a first step, or it may mean a severance of European Islam from the Continent of its birth.

The Deccan Education Society:—Professor P. M. Limaye of the Fergusson College, Poona, has brought out a history of the famous Deccan Education Society of which the College is the eldest child. The period covered is fifty-five years from 1880 to 1935. They are most eventful years in Indian history. The Indian National Congress was founded in 1885 and the National Social Conference in 1887. Lord Ripon had appointed an Education Commission to report on the state of education and it had reported on the desirability of affording free scope for non-official enterprise in higher education. The Deccan Education Society was the first body in this country which applied the principle of renunciation to solve the problem of educational expansion. The middle classes of India are keen on receiving higher education but their means are limited and they can not afford the high fees charged in Government institutions. Some young graduates in Poona conceived the idea of dedicating themselves to the service of their people in the sphere of education. They banded themselves together in the Deccan Education Society, undertaking for a small remuneration to work as teachers and professors in the Society's institutions for a period of twenty years. The determination and self-sacrifice of these young men attracted public sympathy and brought public support. But it always was, and still is, not the least arduous of the duties of Life Members to tour the country during college vacations for the collection of funds to meet the growing needs of expansion. Two of the Professors attained all India fame as political leaders; Bal Gangadhar Tilak and Gopal Krishna Gokhale. Another devoted himself to the cause of Women's Education, founded the Hindu Widow's Home which he developed later into the Indian Women's University. Dr. R. P. Paranjpye, now Vice-Chancellor of Lucknow University, won distinction for himself and his alma mater as the first Indian to wrest the Senior Wranglership at Cambridge, and become Principal of the College. He too attained a high position in the political field, becoming Minister of Education in the Bombay Government and later a Member of the Secretary of State's council in London. The Society conducts some excellent High Schools in Poona and other towns. It conducts a second College at Sangli, which bears the name of the present

Viceroy, Lord Willingdon. The Servants of India Society founded by Gokhale near his College, on the same self-denying principle as the Society, has become famous as the headquarters of what may be called the intellectual centre of Indian politics. The Seva Sadan Society for educating young women and to train them to useful careers as teachers, nurses and social workers, is also an offshoot of the same movement.

Italy and Ethiopia:—If, as Rome messages claim, Ethiopians have been welcoming the Italian Army everywhere and there is no opposition offered by Ethiopian forces, the surrender of the Emperor and the settlement of the terms of peace will be a matter of a few days or weeks at the most. The relations between Britain and Italy have been fluctuating from day to day. One day the Italian Press is furiously hostile, the next day it pleads for friendship and co-operation between the two nations. It may be that the Ethiopians are waiting for the supply of arms and ammunition which, now that the ban has been lifted, are reaching the country in large quantities. The Italian Government has protested to the League of Nations and the countries concerned against the imposition of economic sanctions. The news that Austria which is at present under a Fascist Government patronised by Italy, has joined other nations and placed a ban on the export of arms to Italy may mean either that Italy is losing ground in its conflict with the League or that German influence in Austria is growing as a consequence of Mussolini's pre-occupation in Ethiopia.

Buddhism and Conversion:—The Buddhists have sent a cautious message to Dr. Ambedkar, with reference to his speech at Yeola. At a meeting of Calcutta Buddhists the following resolution was passed: "That Dr. Ambedkar be requested to reconsider the step announced by him at the Conference of Harijans recently held at Nasik in view of the larger interests of the Indian Society as a whole and that if after such reconsideration he still finds no reason to alter his decision, he is invited to embrace Buddhism as his religion which guarantees perfect equality of status both social and religious to all those who profess it and which grown out of the soil of this country represents its highest achievement in toleration, universality and justice and is least calculated to disturb the constructive forces in the social regeneration of India." It may be hoped, writes the journal of the Mahabodhi Society, that Dr. Ambedkar will give due consideration to the request made by the Buddhists before taking any decisive step. "There is no doubt that he will find in Buddhism a complete satisfaction for the rationalist temper which an educated man develops almost unconsciously and for the religious, civic, social and educational equality whose absence is felt so keenly by a large section of the Hindu society." But it is not this subjective achievement that Dr. Ambedkar is after. Will Buddhism lead to social equality which is what he wants? Civic and educational equality, he already has.

BOMBAY, November 16, 1935.

LEAGUE MANDATES.

The Report of the work of the Permanent Mandates Commission at its twenty-seventh session held in June, was received last week. It is made to the Council of the League of Nations and consists of brief comments on the report of each of the mandatories on the administration of the territory entrusted to it. All the mandatories except Japan were represented at the sittings. The Commission had before it the commercial agreement between Great Britain and France which declared that preferences in force exclusively between territories under the sovereignty, suzerainty, protection or mandate of either Power shall not be subject to the most-favoured nation clause of the agreement. The Commission took exception to the inclusion of territories under mandate of the League of Nations and requested the Council to call the attention of the two Governments to the condition laid down in the mandates for Palestine, Syria, the Cameroons and Togoland and Tanganyika, against establishing a preferential system. In regard to the Reports on Palestine and Syria, the Commission asked for the reasons for which the imports of products of a State (Japan and Germany) which has ceased to be a Member of the League of Nations, are admitted on an equal footing with the products of States, members of the League. The Commission noted that the political institutions of Syria were still suspended and hoped that circumstances will shortly make it possible for the mandatory Power "to pursue a policy likely to facilitate the progressive development of Syria." The Commission wanted to know in the next Report from Tanganyika why the Mandatory Power regards the issue of a common postal stamp for Kenya, Uganda and Tanganyika compatible with the fiscal interests of the last-named territory which is administered under a mandate. The amalgamation of the postal services of the three territories of which the common stamp is a symbol, was carried out as part of a scheme for closer union between them. The Permanent Mandates Commission evidently regards the amalgamation with suspicion. The Commission has asked for more information about some other points in Tanganyika administration, among others of the number and influence of the native educated classes and the part taken by them in the administration of native affairs. The Commission emphasised the responsibility of the Australian Government for the education of the people of the mandated territory of New Guinea in connection with the proposal of that Government to entrust it wholly to Missions. With one or two doubtful exceptions, all the petitions from aggrieved persons in the mandated territories were rejected. One of the few which escaped this summary fate was a petition from the Indian Association of Tanganyika regarding the railway system in that territory. The Association was referred to the remarks of the Commission on the report of the Mandatory Power, expressing the hope that the decisions on the complex questions of the railways of Tanganyika and Kenya will prove advantageous to Tanganyika and requesting complementary information in the next report. The Indian population in East Africa view with great anxiety the extension of the Kenya anti-Indian policy to the affairs of Tanganyika.

The League of Nations has no agency, neither has it the power, to enforce observance by mandatories of the conditions of their mandates and to prevent or punish their violation. The sessions of the Permanent League Commission are not open to the public though the report of the proceedings is published and is debated in the League Assembly. It can ask for information which the Mandatory Power can give or refuse as it likes. Or worse still, it can, and often does, give evasive answers to questions, which are more amusing than instructive. Even the asking of questions is resented sometimes. Japan has left the League but she has kept her mandated areas and does not even send a report of their administration to the Permanent Commission. France rules Syria as a French colony. It is uncertain how much longer the British Government will resist the pressure on it from Kenya and South Africa to assimilate the administration of Tanganyika to theirs. Nevertheless, the mandate method is an advance on annexation. Mussolini, if he cared, can have a mandate for practically the whole of Ethiopia but his refusal to accept it shows that there is a difference between administration by mandate and annexation. If nothing else, a mandate involves the right of other nations and of world opinion to sit in judgment on the mandatory, if it should violate the terms of the mandate. This view of the mandate idea has led to a plea for its application to all colonies. The New Statesman has made the startling suggestion that, as the only way of avoiding a world war, Great Britain should voluntarily accept a mandate from the League of Nations for her own colonies. Sir Samuel Hoare in his great speech at the League of Nations spoke of the possibility of a fairer distribution of the world's colonial products. The New Statesman points out that this means nothing. Every nation can buy all she wants now if it has the money. But they have no assurance of supplies in case of war, when they would most need supplies. "Even if we could make large economic concessions," it observes, "they would not meet the case. No policy of economic concessions on the part of the British Empire will suffice to stop the Italians from wanting Abyssinia, or the Germans from watching for a favourable chance to demand the return of their lost colonies." The first and immediate need is to stop Italian aggression by applying rigorously the economic sanctions against it. That will strengthen the League's position and make it a political reality without involving it in war. When that happens the New Statesman boldly suggests, though it fully realises that the suggestion will be strenuously opposed, that Britain might place her colonial administration under League supervision, and virtually hold her colonial empire under mandate from the League. The only way of removing the grievance of Italy and Germany is for the nations which have colonies, Great Britain and France, to place them under League control. "The fact must be faced," writes the journal, "that the sense of grievance exists, not because those countries lack what they ought to have, but because Great Britain and France have what they had never the right to acquire. Imperialism itself is evil; and the evil can not be remedied either by extending it to such territories as are still unannexed or by sharing out "possessions" which do not rightly belong to any European Power. How precisely it is to be remedied, without a series of world convulsions that may wreck civilisation, no one can yet foresee." The New Statesman's suggestion was influentially supported at a Conference on "Peace and the Colonial Problem" held a fortnight back under the auspices of the National Peace Council. Dr. Gooch presided and among those who spoke in support of the suggestion were Sir Arthur Salter, and Lord Lothian. India will heartily co-operate in any measure calculated to rid the world of imperialism even if she has to leave the League of Nations in order to give Britain the status of a League mandatory charged with the duty of rendering administrative advice and assistance until such time as she is able to stand alone.

THE ENGLISH PUBLIC SCHOOL.

Mr. Stephen Foot's article in the Nineteenth Century for January 1927, from which we quoted passages last week, is really an apology for the English Public School. He pleaded that it was really not so bad as it was when he went to one as a clever Lower Fifth boy and his presence was resented by a boy in the same class, three years his senior, by kicking him down the passage with appropriate epithets and fearful threats of what would have happened to him if he went above his senior next week. Such an incident does not occur today, he added. In the old days a studious boy was called "a swot" and subjected to sundry humiliations. Mr. Foot declared that this was no longer the case. But the most significant passage in the article was Mr. Foot's observation that the way in which the Public School had grown up showed that "it is probably the best suited to us as a nation. More particularly the system seems to produce the type of man who is prepared to shoulder responsibilities, and this is essential to a nation which has to administer a vast Colonial Empire." We know what "shouldering responsibilities" in connection with colonial empires means. It means, acting before you know the facts and, indeed, without caring to know the facts. Jallianwala was an exaggerated illustration of this quality fostered by the Public School. But where is the colonial empire where the Doononian can find scope for the exhibition of this quality? Colonialism has been shown up in its true colours by Signor Mussolini and the cry now is, let us share our colonial products with others. Also, secondary schools (day schools) are producing just as a good type of men in England as the Public Schools and, according to a well-known Head Master of one of them (quoted in the same magazine), if every Public School in the country were closed, the secondary schools would immediately shoulder the responsibility they laid down and would not be found wanting in any respect. The Public School tradition is wearing thin in its own home land.

The English Public School owes a good deal of its reputation to the legend that Waterloo was won in the playing fields of Eton. Have these fields lost their virtue? Mr. Lloyd George's War Memoirs tell a story of ineptitude on the part of high Army commanders, which would be incredible were they not the testimony of a man who was Prime Minister and had to bear the burden of their mistakes. Here is a passage from the terrible chapters on Passchendaele, the Battle of the Mud: "The price paid in this war for immunity to Generals was prodigious. No one suggests that it is the duty of Generals to lead their men up to the barbed wire, through the mud, while machine guns are playing upon them. But, had men high up in military rank, ordering or continuing an offensive, been obliged by the exigencies of duty to view for themselves something of the character of the terrain of attack and the nature of the operations they were ordering their officers and men to undertake, the famous assaults of the Somme, Monchy, Bullecourt, Chemin des Dames and Passchendaele would never have occurred." All these high officers were no doubt Public School men, trained to give orders and take responsibilities. The Commander-in-Chief in India regretted recently that the right type of Indian candidate was not coming up for training as officers in the Indian Army and recommended a Public School education for them! As regards the competence of Public School men in diplomacy, here is a quotation from Harold Nicholson who has had opportunities of observation enjoyed by few, "A British politician, unaccustomed to negotiation with foreign statesmen, is prone to disturbance of vanity. The fact that his general culture, as his knowledge of foreign languages, is generally below the level of that possessed by those with whom he is negotiating, gives him a sense of inferiority, to which he reacts in unfortunate ways. Either he will air his school-boy French to the distress of his audience and the confusion of business, or else he will be truculently insular." The only sphere where the English Public School man can claim decided superiority, is in dealing with backward communities who take him at his own valuation and allow him to boss the show. The qualities acquired in the foot-ball field, have been no doubt of value here. The Doononian being of the coloured race himself, will not have the opportunity of exhibiting this talent. Mr. Foot's comparison between English Public School boys and boys of corresponding age in Continental schools, is crystallised in the phrase which we quoted last week: "Games instead of girls." By way of explanation, he added: "Looked at broadly, the effect of the English system as compared with the Continental is that during the years of growth boys think (and talk) about games instead of the charms of the other sex." He deprecates the tendency among boys even in English Public Schools to take less interest in games, because, in his opinion, "if boys have little interest in games they will turn to girls." "Intellectual pursuits will not provide much of an outlet for the hunting instinct and spirit of adventure in a growing boy." In other words, if English boys do not run after a ball they will run after girls.

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

The Public School aims at making the English boy derive the sensual, æsthetic, and spiritual satisfaction which the continental boy derives from playing with girls, from playing with an inanimate round substance called a ball. So far as this aim is successful, the Freudian will explain that the ball has a symbolic significance for the English young man. It is also probable that the love of games instilled in early youth tends to make all life a game without any purpose other than that of amusement for an idle hour. This idea, fostered by the Public School, of girls as the prey of boys from which the latter can be diverted by being given a ball to be knocked about with a bat or kicked about with the foot, is responsible for a trait in the English character akin to sadism traceable in the brutalities of the forcible feeding of suffragettes. It is also responsible for the bitter anti-male animus of English feminists unknown in any other part of the world. The co-education movement which is based on a more natural and civilised view of the relations between boys and girls, than of hunter and hunted, has established itself in England as in other countries, and in India too there is a growing volume of opinion in its favour. We do not want "flannelled fools and muddled oafs" to form a ruling caste in India.

THE MAKING OF A CONSPIRATOR.

In spite of the succession of conferences, committees, commissions and private publications on India; the ignorance of the British on things Indian is colossal. It is only natural, therefore, that the new arrival depends greatly on friends here for a working knowledge of the country and its customs. As usually these are resident Englishmen, either in Government service or trade, the views imbibed are as a matter of course appreciative of the benefits and benevolence of British rule and of the utility of maintaining racial prestige in this country. Mr. Lester Hutchinson differed in no way from other Englishmen visiting India. He did not, at any rate according to his "Conspiracy at Meerut" (Messrs. George Allan and Unwin, 5s.), go searching for trouble. He knew next to nothing about India. So far is he from Communism that even the Meerut prosecution failed to make him one. And he has too keen a sense of humour to succeed as a politician. The picture of himself which he presents to the reader of this entertaining book is rather that of one of Mr. P. G. Wodehouse's young men—Bertie Wooster, but alas, unattended by Jeeves. But the friends waiting for him in India were connected with the Left Wing of the Labour movement and so this young man of twenty-three who had set out with £10 in his pocket and "the prospect of a fairly good position on an Indian newspaper," was caught in a wild current of conflicting forces and was thrown into Meerut Jail as an under-trial prisoner in the famous Communist Conspiracy Case. Mr. Hutchinson seems to have suffered for his friends right through his five years' stay in India and, when he expresses his gratitude for the kindness he received at their hands, more than one reader will smile at the simplicity of this young Englishman. A shrewder writer would have assessed the kindnesses as compensation for his friends for having foolishly even if unwittingly, been involved in the biggest and longest political prosecution launched by any state. It is obvious that from the first the Government of India acted on the saw that a man is known by the company he keeps. "My clothes," writes Mr. Hutchinson, "attributing this special attention to the general vigilance of Indian Customs officials, "were examined minutely, considerable interest being shown in my socks, which I was forced to unroll to convince the official who seemed to regard me as a desperate criminal, that there was nothing concealed in them.....Luggage is ransacked with a zeal and disregard for convenience which most other countries would consider excessive." Even Mr. Hutchinson who reveals a startling lack of sophistication in his book, must surely be aware that customs officials cannot apply the same minute inspection they gave him and his neighbour, an Englishwoman who possessed a rusty revolver, to every one who comes to India.

Mr. Hutchinson narrates a strange story. Even the insects seem to have started plaguing this young visitor on his arrival in India. He describes his brief stay with a theosophist host at Chowpathy. "Hardly had I removed my coat," he writes, "when I saw on the wall near the head of my bed, an enormous and hairy spider nearly as big as my hand." When he goes to bed he suddenly becomes aware of things crawling over his body—bed bugs. When he gets out of this living inferno, the mosquitoes feast on him. He goes to friends in Khar—which, by the way, is not, as Mr. Hutchinson believes, land reclaimed from the sea under the governorship of Lord Lloyd but a dumping ground for Bandra refuse developed under a town planning scheme—to suffer persecution at the hands of a typical suburban bore (an importer of sewing machines), who follows him with greater persistence than the mosquitoes do. Mr. Hutchinson found that while he was accustomed himself to these trials, the magnate who controlled the newspaper which was to be his oyster, grew unstable financially. It was time that he did something to earn a livelihood. What Mr. Hutchinson did was quite different and rather calculated to arouse suspicion even in the minds of the Indian police—who are ordinarily very careful to avoid offending a white man—since unattached young men with no "visible means of subsistence" are most inclined to mischief. He acted in a play by Tagore called "Red Oleanders," which he now regards as meaningless but which his friends apparently thought was good enough to act. He naively asks us to believe that the police regarded it with suspicion merely on account of the word 'red'. That it was not all gibberish, as Mr. Hutchinson maintains, is proved by even a casual reference to the play itself. Red Oleanders has been described as the dramatisation of the struggle between personality and the machine, (cf. The Golden Book of Tagore, pages 141-5). It is quite possible that the Government, and even the Indian public to some extent, might have mistaken this histrionic venture as propaganda for Gandhiji. This would account for the official black mark on this count, though it would be most objectionable to Mr. Hutchinson. For he detests the Mahatma more than he does any imperialist or capitalist. He even quarrels with him for his looks but his main grievance seems to arise from the fact that Gandhiji in his negotiations with Lord Irwin for the release of political prisoners, did not insist on the freeing of the Meerut accused. Mr. Hutchinson does not care to disguise his contempt for the nationalist movement which he considers to be a bourgeois rising. Yet by a strange logic he is annoyed that its leaders do not pull his chestnuts out of the fire for him. A serious obsession which Mr. Hutchinson shares with other Englishmen is a strong belief that every Indian public worker is playing a selfish game. He refers contemptuously to "unemployed lawyers who honoured the labour movement with their patronage" as if an unemployed journalist had any better claims to direct a class war. He condemns nationalists on the ground that they want to substitute the exploiter in Gandhi cap for the exploiter in the topee rejecting their argument that the Indian capitalist can be better controlled by Indian opinion than the white trader. As the achievement of communist ideals is very far off for India, Mr. Hutchinson figures in Indian political life as just another factor working towards Indian disunity.

Mr. Hutchinson's career in India after Red Oleaners illustrates the saying about idle hands perfectly. His newspaper job had not materialised but he still considered himself a journalist and attended meetings of workers during a mill-strike in Bombay. Naturally he suffered the disadvantage of a free-lance journalist in no one taking his journalism seriously. His sympathies with the workers grew. He at the same time developed other activities in connection with Youth Leagues. And here again he showed singular want of tact or even political commonsense. He formed a study circle to study Communism from "the purely academic point of view" and he writes of it, "Minutes were carefully kept and in case these minutes should fall into the hands of mischievous persons, the members were referred to by pseudonyms; for it is dangerous in India to allow the knowledge that you are studying progressive political literature to become public property." Alas, this was wisdom half-digested. It was infinitely more dangerous to use pseudonyms. Then he somehow became Vice-President of the two leading trade unions in Bombay and editor of a paper. And before Mr. Hutchinson could master his politics he was hauled up by the Government in the Meerut Conspiracy Case, an ill-advised and meaningless prosecution which brought fame and popularity and ruin to several harmless and ineffectual gentlemen. Mr. Hutchinson spent, it must be remembered, nearly three out of his five years of India in jail and was compelled for at least another six months to hang round Meerut. His information on jail life is more accurate than his impressions of life outside. For example, his description of the orthodox Hindu "smearing himself with streaks of ash-coloured paint, so that he leaves his house in the morning bearing on his forehead, breast and paunch a choice collection of the phallic symbols of Shiva" sounds clever but is just nonsense. The three horizontal stripes which the orthodox Shaivite wears on his body, arms and forehead is ash and not paint. And it is no more phallic than the sickle or the hammer. Then again, his assessment of the Anglo-Indian community might easily have been more charitable. "Aping the European on the salary of the Indian," he writes, "they have the racial virtues of neither. They are despised by Indian and European alike and are employed chiefly on the railways and in the police. Acutely suffering from an inferiority complex, they are loud and superficial, arrogant to the Indian whenever they dare and servile to the European. Their attempts to preserve their status as a section of the ruling race in spite of poverty are often pathetic; in those attempts the girls of the community take their share... They are an unfortunate community without position, intelligence or integrity. For the most part products of the casual lusts of the sex-starved Europeans they live a precarious existence, riding without anchor in turbulent seas; an artificial community in danger of being abandoned by their contemptuous progenitors and protectors." We have omitted a statement about Anglo-Indian women which is on the face of it too sweeping to be true. We are surprised that an Englishman of Mr. Hutchinson's education and culture should have permitted himself to indulge in it.

Mr. Hutchinson is at his best in writing of the Meerut Case and his jail experiences. His pictures of his colleagues, the prosecution lawyers and the judges, magistrates and other officers with whom he came in contact are delightful and entirely free from prejudice. Only in writing of his defence lawyers on whom he is very hard, does he allow his feelings to run away with him. Two sketches—his portrayal of Mr. S. H. Jhabvala at the inquiry by the magistrate at Meerut and his description of the affair of Mr. B. F. Bharucha at the Appeal before the Allahabad High Court—are too good to be lost. "Most of us refused," writes Mr. Hutchinson, "to make any statement at that stage; but one or two of the accused elected to explain away their conduct. Of these the most entertaining was Mr. S. H. Jhabvala, the only representative of the Parsi community among the accused. Mr. Jhabvala showed that he understood the value of dramatic effect: he entered the witness stand with his defence in one hand and a Bible in the other, because the magistrate being a European, he rightly supposed him to be a Christian, and therefore more likely to be favourably impressed by the Bible than by the Koran, the Mahabharata (sic) or the teachings of Zoroaster. He cut a very eccentric figure as he stood there in his strange white outfit, lanky grey hair floating in the breeze from the fan, spectacles adjusted on the very point of his thin elongated nose, the comic effect of the whole being emphasised by his air of moral indignation. And if his figure was comic, his statement was more so. Declaring himself to be the father of fifty trade unions, which in itself was a striking example of the need for birth control, he proceeded to describe himself as a seeker after Truth, striving to acquire the "true Christ-like spirit." He declaimed his statement over a period of two or three days, during which he kept all present in a state of continuous hilarity. The evidence he explained away more amusingly than convincingly, and he concluded with a pious hope that the magistrate, whose 'poor little fingers,' he hoped were not tired, would be included in the New Year (or) Birthday Honours... The speech did not save Mr. Jhabvala from being committed." Mr. Hutchinson has surpassed himself in this account and all who know the Parsi Labour leader will appreciate the sketch. The Bharucha incident was in vindication of the Gandhi cap. "There is a rule of the High Court," says the writer, "that everyone attending the Court must either be bare-headed or wear a turban. Mr. Bharucha, delegate to the Appeal from the Bombay Defence Committee, arrived and sat in Court wearing a mis-shapen Gandhi cap, to which the Chief Justice took exception, and wrote to Mr. Bharucha asking him in future to observe the rule." Mr. Bharucha maintained that the head-wear was sacred to the Parsi community—most of whom, by the way, detest it—and could not be removed without disrespect to the Court. He prepared a reply and showed it to Mr. Hutchinson. "I asked him why he had spelt 'bare' bear," and he replied that he knew it was wrong but that the Chief Justice in his letter had spelt it "bear" and he thought that it would be discourteous on his part if in his reply he appeared to correct the Chief Justice." Mr. Bharucha's representation only resulted in his staying away from the Court. Both the courtesy and the non-co-operation are typical of Mr. B. F. Bharucha.

Mr. Gauba in Egypt:—"Mahatma Gandhi has a very great position in Egypt as well as in Europe. Gandhi is the idol of Egypt. The Egyptians name various things after him. To them Gandhi is the symbol of awakening in the East," said Mr. K. L. Gauba, M. L. A., in the course of his lecture at the Y. M. C. A. Hall, Lahore.

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Nov. 16

THE DEPRESSED CLASSES AND HINDUISM.

I have received letters from all over the country asking me to express my views on the recent controversy as regards the Depressed Classes renouncing Hinduism.

First of all I should like to make my position very clear. I have regard and reverence for all religions. I have been educated in Christian Institutions—Wesley College and the Christian College, Madras. I served for many years in Christian Institutions namely—Voorhees College and Wesley College. I have never changed my religion, though I have imbibed many of the Christian ideals. People are at liberty to seek and embrace whatever religion they wish in the interests of their spiritual welfare.

I have not read the full speech of the President of the Depressed Classes Conference held at Yeola on the 13th October, for nowhere have I seen it published in full. It is said that a resolution was passed at this Conference asking the community to sever itself from Hinduism and embrace any other religion which would guarantee them equal status with other members of that faith. It should be noted that this Conference is only a District Conference and it is very significant that the President who made this bold suggestion to his admiring audience did not recommend any particular religion for them to adopt.

So far Mr. Balu, the famous cricketer, who is the leader of a large section of the Depressed Classes of the Bombay presidency, has clean bowled out the President of this Conference with his well weighed and weighty statement. Other leading members of the community all over India, Rao Bahadur R. Srinivasan, M.L.C., Rao Saheb V. I. Munuswami, M.C.C., Rao Saheb L. C. Guruswami, ex-M.L.C., Dr. Ram Prasad, Dr. Solonki, M.L.C., Messrs. R. L. Biswas, P. K. Rajbhoj, N. S. Kajrolker and Sawmi A. S. Sakajanandhan, M.L.C., and others have rightly expressed strong disapproval of this Resolution.

While I fully share in the resentment which many of our men feel at the treatment meted out to our people in many parts of the country by the so-called High Caste Hindus, I would at the same time request them to compare conditions existing now with what they were, say, 15 years ago. Conditions have improved considerably to-day. A large section of educated Hindu India has come to condemn the practice of untouchability and has thrown its weight on the side of reform. I venture to say that in view of the awakening of the Hindu conscience that has been noticed in regard to our condition and status, the days of Untouchability as practised towards our community are now numbered. It should be remembered that in the course of a decade things have changed considerably in favour of the Depressed Classes and there is also a very strong awakening among the Depressed Classes themselves.

The Congress under the inspiration of Mahatma Gandhi has taken up the question of removal of untouchability and the Hindu Maha Sabha has followed suit. It is our duty to help them in their endeavour and not to throw obstacles in their way.

In the last Legislative Assembly two Bills were introduced and discussed. The Temple Entry Bill and the Untouchability Abolition Bill. Both these Bills were intended to give equal status to the Depressed Classes with the other Hindus and to remove obstacles in the way of such equality. What part did the organisers of this Yeola Conference play then in regard to these measures? Did not some of them, help the opponents to these measures to strangle the Bills? Did not the chief opposer to these Bills and the stout champion of the Sanatana Dharma, Raja Bahadur G. Krishnamacharriar, call to his aid the President of this Conference and say that he did not want Temple Entry and quote him as saying that the dispute was not between the Caste Hindus and the Depressed Classes but between the Caste Hindus and Mr. Gandhi? The Depressed Classes have every right to ask him when he ever set any value on religion as a means of social uplift? Is it not a fact that he opposed Mahatma Gandhi when he placed the religious reforms before the economic? There is Mr. C. F. Andrews testifying to this fact in an interview granted to the Manchester Guardian.

The Depressed Classes have every right to ask him whether he had ever before taken any interest in their religious life and given any hint that Hinduism as a whole was to blame for the social and economic depression of these classes? Did he ever take any part in social and religious reform movements in Hindu Society before coming to the conclusion that Hinduism is un-reformable, before taking upon himself the responsibility of advising 70 millions of people to change their religion?

It is to be noted that while he gives the negative counsel that they should renounce Hinduism, as if it could be done in a moment—the moment the word is spoken by a single man—he does not say in what direction they should move and what religion they should embrace in place of the one they are called on to renounce. What is the use of such destructive advice without a constructive proposal? Whither does he want to lead the people? Does he want to play the part of Moses in the Bible or of Zebek Dorshi in De Quincey's Revolt of the Tartars? Moses was a religious as well as a national leader and had some vague Promised Land in view when he called the Israelites out of Egypt; but Zebek Dorshi—the less said about him, the better. One has only to read De Quincey's classical story to realise the untold miseries resulting in extinction to which he subjected his people and all for giving vent to his spirit of ambition and vengeance.

Even now it is not too late for the President of the Nasik Conference to say what religion he has in view—Christianity, Zoroastrianism or Islam.

The immediate remedy that suggests itself to me is the total withdrawal of the legal and administrative recognition to the superstition of pollution. The laws as they are administered to-day uphold these superstitions under the guise of preserving peace and punish the untouchables who attempt to enforce their civic rights. On the 26th of September last I introduced in the Legislative Assembly a Bill called the Removal of Social Disabilities among certain classes of Hindus. Bills like this, if passed into Act, will go a long way to remove civic and secular disabilities from which the Depressed Classes are suffering under the existing Laws. This Bill will also remove the obstacles created by the British India Courts giving legal recognition to certain social customs and usages which enlightened public opinion regard as unjust, anti-social and irreligious.

If we do not achieve social and religious equality in Hindu Society it is no doubt the fault of the Caste Hindus, but it is also our fault. Are we united? It must be acknowledged that the lack of unity among those who speak in the name of the community has had adverse effects on the rise of the community and has seriously jeopardised the work on its behalf; and without unity amongst ourselves the interests of the people are bound to suffer. I appeal to my people to consolidate the community and stand united and work with patience and determination. If this is done our success is assured.

I now appeal to my people not to be led away by the speeches of people who do not really understand the inwardness of things.

I now appeal to them not to lend their support to men who for reasons of their own seek to undermine the solidarity of the community and to defeat the endeavours towards uplift by setting up rival organisations and thus becoming rival leaders, whose only business now-a-days seems to be to sow seeds of dissatisfaction, distrust and class hatred in the hearts of our poor innocent people. I am not at all perturbed by the speeches of such impulsive and vehement politicians.

Those who are in actual touch with the Depressed Classes will see that they are now passing through a stage in their history, when they begin to adopt and adapt such Hindu customs, ceremonies and worship as are suited to their social and religious needs, and that every Cheri, Mohalla and Basti has a temple; where hitherto there have been no temples and all worship was neglected, there is a tendency for religious revival. People bathe, dress cleanly and wear marks of religious devotion and this is due to the influence of a reformed Hinduism.

Hinduism is our religion and it is sacred to us. It is our duty to preserve it and purify it. We do not want to cut away from the Hindu fold. We want a better recognition. A recognition of the fact that we are men equally with themselves, the Caste Hindus. Our goal is the removal of untouchability and our aim is to become an unquestioned part of Hindu Society.

CAN HINDUISM SAVE ITSELF?

Religion like a golden jewel can be completely remoulded but cannot be repaired part by part. Its content is spiritual gold but its form always tried to please the eye of the age. Although born on poetic heights, every religion had to come down to the level where the average man stood and its success lay in how far he was able to assimilate its principles. Christianity is not what exactly Jesus conceived of it but it is what people understood about it. His teachings are still there, the golden content, but its form is but a corollary to the main social organisation which received those teachings. So is the case with all religions, the fundamental principles, the original teachings are common among them all. But their shapes vary according to the different environmental conditions to which they had to be adapted. If we have to study religion, it is not, therefore, merely the philosophic side that we have to study, but the social or organic side, the system of society with which that philosophy is associated. Comparative religion may convince us of the affinity of the fundamental teachings of all religions. But that is not enough. Comparative study of the social life to which religion is a part, is necessary. We must see whether any religion exists at all in that society or it is living merely on its name. When we extol our ancestral greatness, the high philosophy implied in our Vedas, we do not care to know how far we are able to utilise them in our actual life. Omission of this social or organic side of religion is a dangerous folly of almost all of our philosophers and reformers.

When in the ancient days the Hindu sages saw the necessity of reorganising the whole society according to the high truths they discovered, certainly they assembled together, discussed the problem, divided the people according to their functions and fixed regular duties for them with a stamp of religious sanction on them. The class of intellectuals, the Brahmins, the fittest class by virtue of their training, had to live a life of poverty and the King, the most powerful element in the society, had to bend to the exhortations of that beggar-sage, the Brahmin.

Religion was the only legislature, the supreme authority and the King was only the executive head. The term that is used for the legal term "crime" which dealt with the irregularities of superficial life is the term "sin" which permeates into the very being of man. It covers also the world of thought and prevents a person from even thinking anything evil. The Hindu religio-legal code dealt with every detail of a person's activity. And Religion in the Hindu society was the only dominating force. There are draw-backs and very dangerous drawbacks too but in those days long before Plato and Pericles appeared on the scene the creation of such a compact and self-sufficient social order was a marvel, it was a miracle.

But the time factor was least considered. No one foresaw that in the long run life would reveal new economic situations, new necessities and problems and that a stereotyped formula for social or individual life for all time would be more a hindrance than a use. The sins of the past are not the sins of today. Education to a 'sudra' or a peasant was a sin and he was severely punished if he ever tried to have any; but as the democratic spirit was slowly introduced into life, ignorance of the peasant has become the greatest sin today. For behind all the conflicting conceptions of evil which time forced on the society, there always prevailed the true religious aspiration for the ultimate happiness of its life as a whole, no member excepting. In the Hindu society all social and even economic laws being associated with the name of religion, they have become a matter of faith to every one of its members. Change is abhorred and no room is left for the modifications that the time is bent upon bringing about in all things it governs. Duties were not divided among men but men were divided among duties, and in doing so no individual inclination or talent was taken into account. That is why natural talent was always inclined to rebel against the society and seek the shelter of that power or that organisation which offered free scope for its development.

Between ethics and politics there was always a keen rivalry. The one was jealous of the other and the one's failure is the other's opportunity. Ethics demand enlightenment and fitness for moral growth from the average man while politics lives on public ignorance. It was Shelley that said that without imagination there cannot be any virtue; if one has to be good he must first have the capability to place himself in another's position. Morality can exist only in such a society which is well-trained or well-educated. And politics is afraid of such a condition for in such a society it has to act as a mere slave. In a developed society law and legislatures are but mere formalities. People do not need diplomacy to keep themselves in order, when they know their mind and responsibilities of life. Social duties would become social traits and morality a general habit. But politics does not want all this. It desires to appear omnipotent and overrule all other claims. In order that people should believe in its indispensability it puts them in ignorance as far as possible.

Morality is the social side of religion. It comes into existence when religion interferes with life and prescribes social duties to the individual members so that they might be able to utilise their social opportunities for their true individual freedom. And religion is a failure when the social duties it prescribes bind the individual and block his freedom. There, in that failure of religion lies the success of politics. Hindu society burnt its widows; there politics stepped in and there was legislation that burning of widows amounts to homicide. It married its children and infants, there was the anti-child-marriage bill. It suppressed the lower classes and called them untouchables, then they are politically divided from the main Hindu fold and are given separate political recognition. Thus the greatest of our Vedic philosophies proved to be of no use to us; they could not regulate our lives for we all along remained ignorant and opaque.

But is religion a necessity? Why not we satisfy ourselves with our politician and his all powerful laws? But the limitations of politics would be the limits of life. The function of the politician is always negative. He can prevent evil but he cannot inspire goodness. Politics aims at mere regimentation. Its business is finished when the safety of the people is kept up. It cannot bring them to freedom. Politics is the work of the brain. It cannot lead us very far. Life wants positive growth, complete emancipation. Here religion alone can give a lead, the poetic heights of inspired Vedanta, the full play of the human heart. But it should be a true religion, working efficiently on both the sides, social and individual. "Myself and my Creator" is an attractive philosophy. But it should not go to the extent of neglecting the social duties which connote complete social emancipation.

If Hinduism has to save itself it has to reorganise itself; its old institutions must be adapted to new wants. The priest is in retreat as even the political tyrant. The immoralised ignorant and the ill-fed poor are refusing to be utilised any longer for the happiness of the oppressing few. They are demanding education and necessities of life. They want to be good, at the same time they want to be happy. Slavery and virtue can never go together. The whole Hindu society must be reshuffled; it has to be reorganised. Let the ancient teachings be still maintained. But let the leaders of Hindu society reorganise it in such a way that every one of its members might be able to utilise those teachings for his own good and for the good of those with whom he comes into contact.

It is the pessimistic attitude of the too-practical minded people that sees greatness only in the past, despair in the present and chaos in the future. While the real fact is that the past which could provide schemes for individual emancipation has yielded a present where signs can be seen of the beginnings of complete social emancipation. Life is the truest of truths; and it will toss any scheme away, any organisation, or any institution into oblivion if it seeks to prevent its growth. It does not accept pretensions or favours. It exists not for the sake of scriptures but scriptures exist for its sake. Hinduism must re-organise itself; it has to prepare a fresh code of morals in accordance to the times and true to the democratic spirit of the day. In fact that is the task now before our Tagores, Arabindos, Radhakrishnans and Malaviyas. That is the only way of saving Hinduism or it will perish into the enclosing political power.

Mr. Elwin :- Mr. Verrier Elwin, of the Gond Seva Mandal, at Karanjia in the Mandla district, has written to the Metropolitan formally to announce his decision to be no longer a member of the Church of England, on the grounds that during the past five years he has gradually developed an outlook on life and an estimate of the actual nature of Christianity which is not compatible with membership of that Church. He has made it clear that he is not at present thinking of joining any other Church, nor of adopting any other religion and that he has left the Church of his baptism without any bitterness or hostility, with nothing but love and reverence for the great tradition in which he has grown up. But it would be dishonest for him to stay longer. Mr. Elwin should not, of course, be any longer addressed as "Father" or the "Reverend."—H. T.

THE GONDS AND HINDUISM.

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

With the greater part of your leading article on "Hinduism and Aboriginal Tribes" (November 2) I have no quarrel. I have never denied that some Gonds have adopted many elements of Hindu culture and belief, and that the most natural path of development for all Gonds is along broadly Hindu lines. You do not, however, consider the very interesting question of how far Hinduism itself has adopted aboriginal ideas. Today in our villages, we see not only Hinduised Gonds, but aboriginalised Hindus and even Mussalmans.

Where I part company with you is on this point:—I have a very high regard for the Gond culture, expressed as it is mainly in song, legend and the dance. This seems to me to be quite distinctive and to contain values which should be conserved. I believe also that the "primitive," in his freedom of spirit and his simplicity, has a real message for our sophisticated modern world. In our villages, the Gond stands out, in dignity, simplicity and freedom, far above the other villagers. When, therefore, a Gond adopts the unreformed and decadent Hinduism of the backwards, I cannot regard this as a step forward in the evolutionary process. Do forgive me for stressing this—the form of Hinduism into which the Gond normally evolves is that very complex of social inhibitions and economically-harmful practices against which the Indian Social Reformer wages so courageous a battle. The 'tribal' Gond does not believe in untouchability: the 'Hindu' Gond does. The 'tribal' Gond does not put his women in purdah or marry off his children: the 'Hindu' Gond does. The 'tribal' Gond is free as the hills and forest: the 'Hindu' Gond is set about with all the inhibitions of "Touch not, taste not, handle not." The very last thing that I or my Indian colleagues (the majority of whom are Hindus) would do is to hamper the natural evolution of the Gonds. What we object to is the forcing upon them by outsiders of customs and beliefs which do not mark an advance, but a retreat.

Nor can I agree that "the Gonds can never be raised in the social and spiritual scale except through the ancient door of Hinduism." That seems to me to be an extraordinary statement as if I were to say that the Gonds could not get to heaven unless they were baptised in the name of the Holy Trinity. But if you had said, "The most natural line of advance for Gond culture would be through the door of a liberalised and modern Hinduism, the Hinduism of a Vivekananda, a Tagore, a Gandhi," then I think that is probably true. A liberal form of Hinduism is more likely to conserve the Gond cultural values than any other, because, as you say, it is racy of the soil, and whether the Gonds are Hindus at root or no, they come of that same soil. The educational policy of the Gond Seva Mandal is in fact based on this, and you entirely misunderstand me if you think our work is inspired by any idea of separateness from Hindu society.

But if the Gonds and other aboriginals are to be claimed as Hindus, that claim constitutes a great challenge to educated Hindus. They must take them the best that Hinduism can give, and not leave them to appropriate just those very elements which they themselves have discarded. I am sorry you think that the contact of a "White" Man like myself with the Gonds is likely to be disastrous.

If any Hindu will come and take my place, I will gladly yield it to him.

Gond Seva Mandal,
Karanjia,
November 7, 1935.

Yours etc.,
VERRIER ELWIN.

[We do not by any means underrate the valuable elements in Gond culture. As a matter of fact we hold, and said as much in our leading article to which Mr. Verrier Elwin refers, that Hinduism grew out of aboriginal culture as much as, if not more than, from what is called Aryan culture. The Vedas themselves afford long vistas which disclose their own ancestry to have been aboriginal. As regards the inhibitions to which Mr. Verrier Elwin refers, experience and reflection lead us to think that these can and should be discarded, so far as they can be, without affecting others which are wholesome and necessary. Few people, said Renan, have the right to disbelieve Christianity, though he himself had outgrown it. That was said of persons who had grown up in a Christian environment but it applies to all societies which have grown up under the inspiration of religion. Mr. Elwin knows that he has our personal regard and affection and we do not certainly wish him to give up his work. But it is the fact that the White man or woman with the best of intentions are beset in their work for India and Indians by peculiar difficulties because of their race and colour. Even Mrs. Besant who went farther than any European in identifying herself with Indians, felt this, and a few days before her death, said she hoped to be born again in an Indian body to work for India. Our object was to warn Mr. Elwin of the difficulties of the task he has taken upon himself. The last thing we intended was to discourage him in it. He has our complete confidence in him and in his whole-hearted zeal for the uplift of the people whom he has adopted as his own.—Ed., I. S. R.]

BRITISH RULE IN THE BALANCE.*

(BY H. N. BRAILSFORD.)

India has gained immeasurably from familiarity with European thought alike in the realms of sociology and natural science. She has gained no less from European medicine and technology, and while I should be the first to argue that Europe has not yet learned how to draw from machinery its latent blessings of leisure and wealth for all, I am an impenitent Westerner who counts as gain the annihilation of distance and the raising of the standard of life that power-machinery makes possible. Everything here was brought by English hands—every thing from the printing-press to the wireless. The new thinking, the scientific attitude, came equally through the English language. That is indisputable and Englishmen may justly feel proud that it fell to them to carry these gains to India. They had, however, no necessary connection with conquest or sovereignty. If no European soldier, British or French, had ever landed with arms on India's coasts, it is certain that all those benefits would none the less, have arrived, would, none the less have penetrated the whole Peninsula. It is probable that they might have come rather more slowly. It is possible that in the early period they might have encountered resistance from Indian conservatism. None the less, they would have come, and made their way irresistibly, as they have done in other Asiatic States that have preserved their independence. India, if she had escaped European conquest, would doubtless have passed through a long period of confusion and misery before some new Indian Power or Powers—here perhaps the Sikhs and there the Mahrattas—had built a solid political structure on the ruins of the Mogul Empire. India could have derived from the West the major part of the benefits she has received, without the episode of conquest.

To this argument the Imperialist has a possible answer. "Was it no gain, then to be spared the period of confusion, misery and internecine strife, which the coming of the British abridged? The other Asiatic States in question are by comparison homogeneous. Are you sure that the profound communal division in Indian society could ever have been healed? But your view of Western civilization is superficial. One cannot import it in crates with motor-car parts. It is something organic. It demands a new social organisation, the scientific mind, the engineer's outlook: nay, one may say that it demands a new system of law, even a new morality, that will train men to work in teams. Railway and electric power are comparatively useless without a political structure of the Western type. The great service of England to India was that she brought this political fabric and with it the reign of law. Anyone can learn to drive a tractor or a locomotive, but generations must pass before a nation thinks its way into Blackstone's Commentaries and the Wealth of Nations. The case of China is rather less simple than you assume. The Chinese learn readily enough to lay rails and drive locomotives, but their railways are soon bankrupt, because the management is riddled with despotism and craft. The Chinese make first-rate medical doctors, but they lack the first social requisite of civilisation; they have no honest and impartial courts of law."

—The Aryan Path.

This is, at first sight, an impressive and plausible answer, but the reader who examines it closely will perceive that it idealises out of all recognition the process of conquest. The last thing that the conquerors thought of doing was to stimulate the growth of an organic political structure congenial to the new civilisation. On the contrary, they imposed their own rigid bureaucratic system, which has remained alien and external. Four generations elapsed before they risked the first cautious attempt to initiate Indians into the art of government, with the Morley-Minto reforms. If we must speak of railways, the Chinese at least are learning (with some bad failures) the art of management, whereas even to-day Indians are wholly excluded from executive control. Plainly the system of education was not devised to give Indians this "Engineer's outlook." It was not based on science, it was literary and philological, and was designed to train clerks for the illpaid, routine work of commerce and administration. It left the masses untouched and to this day has failed to make any impression whatever on the minds of the villagers.

What in fact the conquerors availed not at all was to acclimatise the new civilisation; they were content to sell its products. Exploiting India as their market, they deliberately destroyed her fine handicrafts. Decade by decade, as their railways penetrated the interior, carrying the cheap output of machinery, they robbed the potter, the smith and the weaver of his livelihood, and drove him to gain a bare subsistence from the soil. As this process went on, the area of the average holding diminished; the average agricultural worker was less fully employed, and to-day a vast potential labour force crowds the village unused and burdens the hungry soil, representing the most colossal waste of human energy existent on this earth. "The British," the reader may say, "are not to blame. This has happened everywhere: it is the inevitable result of the machine age." No it is not: nor has it happened everywhere. On the contrary, when machinery in England ruined the handicrafts men, their children found work in the mills. They were not driven on to the overcrowded soil. In Europe, moreover, with the sedulous assistance of governments, the mechanisation of agriculture was parallel with the mechanisation of industry.

It is then not a fact that conquest and foreign sovereignty quickened the process of adaptation. They delayed it. The policy of free imports postponed the growth of an Indian industrial system till the latter end of the nineteenth century. Every free, national government in the world had, through the greater part of that century, used all its resources of policy to foster and protect the productive capacities of its population. Only after the Great War, and then only on a small scale, was policy turned in India to this end. The shock of the new way of life, the shattering revolutionary impact of the new power-machinery fell on a people powerless to adapt itself, or to use policy to modify its own social structure. It could not react. It could not choose. It could not, as a self-moved community, assimilate or reject. An inexperienced national government facing the merchants, teachers and capitalists of this approaching civilisation would doubtless have made many mistakes, as the Chinese did. But never would it have thought of India as the passive market of the West. That India has been governed for a century and a half by an alien government which started from this conception of her place among the nations is the root explanation of her present poverty. All the rest—the drain of pensions, the annual tribute to the foreign investor, the high cost of a white administration—is incidental, however important it may be.

This is the material side of the conquest. On this view alone it is probable that India has received, as the passive subject of the process, grave and lasting injuries from the impact of Western civilisation that outbalance the benefits. But conquest and alien rule brought also in their train psychological mischiefs that are no less real because they are difficult to measure. The will of this people was paralysed. It lost all sense that it was responsible for its own destiny. Europeans marvel at the "fatalism" of Asiatics, forgetting that they have usurped over this Peninsula the role of Providence. No people in this situation could escape apathy and humiliation. These effects have been enhanced by the bad manners of conquerors (though doubtless there were exceptions among them) who were at pains to claim for their white skins some innate superiority. This arrogance of colour, backed by a real superiority in arms, inflicted on the conquered a deep moral injury. No gain in order, no immunity from war, no courts however incorruptible can outweigh the wrong of a relationship that lames a people's will, insults its self-respect and dooms it to passivity.

ANCIENT INDIA AND ABYSSINIA.

Mr. M. Krishnamachariar writes in the Hindu dated November 9:—On the ethnological and historical relations between Ancient India and Abyssinia, the following passages will be of interest:

4. Cuvier assigns the reign of Amenophis as the epoch of the colonization of Ethiopia from India.—"Discours" p. 18.
5. "At the mouths of the Indus dwell a seafaring people active, ingenious, and enterprising as when, ages subsequent to this great movement, they themselves, with warlike denizens of the Punjab, were driven from their native land to seek the far distant climes of Greece. The commercial people dwelling along the coast that stretches from the mouth of the Indus to the Corea, are embarking on that emigration whose magnificent results to civilisation, and whose gigantic monuments of art, fill the mind with mingled emotions of admiration and awe. These people coast along the shores of Mekran, traverse the mouth of the Persian Gulf, and again adhering to the sea-board of Oman, Hadramant, and Yeman (Eastern Arabia), they sail up the Red Sea; and again ascending the mighty stream that fertilises a land of wonders, found the kingdoms of Egypt, Nubia and Abyssinia. These are the same stock that, centuries subsequently to this colonization, spread the blessings of civilisation over Hellas and her islands."—Pococke's "India in Greece". p. 42.

THE FIRST EUROPEAN MOSLEM CONFERENCE.*

The opening ceremony of the joint European Moslem conference held at Geneva took place on September 12. The Moslems of Europe were well represented by 70 delegates from Moslem communities, groups, and Societies in Europe.

The organizers were the Emir Chekib Arslan, Ishan Bey el Djabri, Dr. Zaki Aly, Mr. Ali El-Ghaiaty.

Among the prominent representatives present may be mentioned:—Salem Effendi Mufti, President of the Ulemas Council, Sarajevo, Yugoslavia. Waisal Alishan, Chief Mufti to Uskub, Bosnia. Dr. Jacob Szykiewicz, Chief Mufti of the Moslems of Poland. Sir Omar Hubert Stewart Rankin and Lady Rankin, of Great Britain. Abdulhamid Houramovitch, President of the Moslem Association of Warsaw, Poland. Count Seif-ul-Islam Barbiellini Amidei, Moslem Orientalist and President of the Oriental Royal Academy at Naples, Italy. Madame Laura Vaglieri, Italian Orientalist. Abdel-Baki El-Omary Bey, Famous Egyptian Lawyer, and Member of the Congress Executive. Messali Hadj, President of the Moslem Organization, "L'Etoile Nord-Africaine" of Paris. Dr. Dervich Korkut, Chief Editor of the Moslem Review "Glasnik" of Belgrade. Professor Muhammad Kantardjitch, Secretary of the Council of Ulemas of Sarajevo. Mehdi Kassem, Honorary Secretary of the Islamic Culture Association of Vienna, Austria. Professor Ahmed Zeki Validi, of the "Islamischer Kulturbund" of Vienna. Sirdar Iqbal Ali Shah, Afghan author. Aly Mohyeddin de Meyerburg, President of the Dutch Moslem Association. J. L. Van Beethem Mohammed Ali, President of the Dutch Moslem Association, La Haye Holland. Mahmoud Bey

Salem Al Arafati, Ex-Judge of the Mixed Tribunals of Egypt, Editor of the Moslem periodical "Arafat" and Honorary Vice-President of the Western Islamic Association, and the "Islamischer Kulturbund" of Vienna. Dr. Zaki Aly, Founder and President of the Islamic Cultural Association of Austria, Founding Member of the Spanish Islamic Society, also Honorary Vice-President of the Western Islamic Association. Muhammed Rassulovic, Secretary of the Hungarian Moslem Association.

The Emir Chekib Arslan delivered the Presidential Address of welcome. The European countries, represented in the Congress were: France, Great Britain, Yugoslavia, Poland, Austria, Germany, Spain, Italy, Albania, Switzerland, Holland and Hungary. The Oriental countries represented by individuals but not in an official quality, were Egypt, Turkey, Syria, Palestine, Persia, Afghanistan, Azerbaijan, Irak, India and the countries of North Africa. The Imam of the Paris Mosque recited several verses from the Holy Quran, and then the Emir Chekib Arslan reviewed the general situation in the Moslem world before and after the abolition of the Caliphate, and urged the Moslems to unite their efforts for the solidarity of Islam. The Congress then discussed a project regarding building a mosque in Varsovia, the capital of Poland. A subscription for the purpose was opened. The grand Mufti of Poland, Dr. Jacob Szykiewicz described the liberal and kind attitude of the Polish Government towards her Moslems. Dr. Zaki Ali proposed that the Congress officially thank the Government of Poland for its broadmindedness and sympathy for the Polish Moslems. This resolution was carried unanimously. Dr. Zaki Aly delivered an important speech on the relations between Europe and Islam. He spoke of the urgent need of organizing Moslem efforts and propaganda in the West, and of presenting true Islam in the most impressive way to the peoples of Europe. He further dealt with Islamic tolerance, morals, the social system, and of the significance of Islam to humanity. The opening ceremony concluded with a banquet attended by all the members of the Congress.

During the second session of the Congress, Mr. Van Beethem Mohammed Ali of Holland, spoke on Islam in Holland and in the Dutch Colonies. He appealed to the Congress for assistance in building a Mosque and Islamic School in the Dutch capital, La Haye. Holland has, the speaker stated, more than 55 millions of Moslem subjects. The notable Italian Orientalist, Count Bernard Barbiellini Amidei, Member of the Italian Parliament, declared at the Congress his conversion to Islam, which appealed to his heart as the true ideal religion. He adopted among cordial congratulations of the Congress the name of "Seif-ul-Islam."

On September 15th, the Congress passed the following among other resolutions: An Address of thanks to the Yugoslavian Government for its kindness to the Moslems of that land. To request the Dutch Government to attend in a more kindly manner to the welfare of the many millions of Muslims in the Dutch Empire. The question of reconciliation between Sunnis and Shias, and eliminating all differences. NOTES

GOPAL KRISHNA DEVADHAR.

After a protracted illness, which entailed much suffering borne with characteristic fortitude, G. K. Devadhar passed away at Bhajekar's private hospital to which he had been removed three weeks ago from Poona. His daughters assisted by women workers of the Seva Sadan were assiduous in their attention to his comfort till the last moment. To his friends, the thought that they will not see his genial face again recurs as a reminder of the dire reality of death. At the funeral pyre, fervent tributes were paid to Devadhar's work and worthy speakers representing all communities. The Bombay Municipal Corporation by a unanimous vote adjourned on Monday out of respect to Devadhar's memory. Devadhar joined the Servants of India Society soon after it was formed by Gokhale. He was its President when he died. The conception of politics to which Gokhale sought to give expression through his Society, was a comprehensive one. Primarily concerned with the attainment of rights of self-government, it left scope and freedom to members to devote themselves to any branch of activity which would enhance the strength and health of the Indian people. Devadhar from the first turned his attention to the task of making the women of India an effective factor in the vast, uncharted realm of social service. He saw that there was going to waste an immense mass of valuable human material for want of training and opportunity to serve themselves and their sisters.

Devadhar had a philosophy of life and a principle and policy in all that he undertook. But he seldom gave expression to them. He laid down no conditions, exacted no qualifications. He gladly admitted whoever sought admission and succeeded, in the cases of most, in sending them out as competent and selfreliant workers in various fields of service to women. All castes and creeds were welcome. No difference was made or allowed to be made between caste Hindus and untouchables. This writer remembers an occasion when a smart young woman, indistinguishable, except for a slight over-emphasis of tone and manner, from any caste woman, walked into his room at the Servants of India Society's Home in Sandhurst Road. Devadhar pointing to her said: "Look here, this girl is one of our Seva Sadan products trained as a teacher. She is now drawing Rs. 70 in a Municipal School and she has come to ask me to have her niece trained in the same way." He added as an after-thought that she was a member of the depressed class. One who was with him some two or three years ago when he visited a village near Ambarnath, which had been burnt down, noted the easy way in which Devadhar made himself at home with the villagers. He and his party had their breakfast in one of the few huts which had escaped the fire. They were served with home-made things which some of the party showed some hesitation before taking. Devadhar, however, at once began eating with evident relish, called for more, and before leaving asked the host for the recipes in order, he told him, that he might have them prepared in his own house, as he liked them much. He was sincerely unconscious of the great contribution he was making to the cause of national regeneration by his work in the Seva Sadan.

Devadhar was naturally sensitive but he never showed it, having disciplined himself to take whatever came in the course of his frequent collection tours for his great institution, as all in the day's work. Whenever work had to be done, he quietly set himself to do it and was never known to plead that he had no time or that he had his hands full, though they were always over-full. Owing to this characteristic, it was sometimes trying to friends who had engagements with him. No one was less concerned about his personal convenience or comfort. With a little more care in this respect, he would perhaps have lived longer for he had a tough constitution. Few people with the complication of ailments to which he was a victim for the last two or three years, would have felt fit to carry on a tenth of the work he had on his hands all the time. From Travancore in the extreme South where he was conducting an enquiry on the co-operative movement, to Simla or Delhi to attend a meeting of the Agricultural Research Association of which he was a member from the first, and back to Travancore within a week, was more than once traversed by the sick man with one or two nurses to attend to his wants. He was sure that Indian women would acquit themselves worthily in every contingency. He took a contingent of women volunteers for relief work in Malabar soon after the Mapla riots and the good work done then laid the foundation of the cordial relations with the people there of which the Devadhar Reconstruction Scheme is the permanent monument. In addition to the several institutions directly affiliated to or administered from the Poona Seva Sadan, it was the model of some others in other provinces. Devadhar with his devoted co-adjutor, Mrs. Janakibai Bhatt, helped to establish them and lent the services of trained workers from Poona till they were able to stand on their own feet. Reference was made above to Devadhar's religion. It was the religion of the Gita, verses from which were often on his lips during the last few days. The country has lost the greatest social worker of our time by his death.

Gandhiji on Social Reform :—Gandhiji comments in the current Harijan on Sir Govindrao Madgavkar's open letter to him and other leaders regarding the need of accelerating the consolidation of Hindu society by abolishing distinctions of caste and sect particularly by the repeal of restrictions on intermarriage and inter-dining. We print Sir Govindrao's letter and Gandhiji's comments thereon. Gandhiji's views now expressed on Varnashrama are certainly more definite than those expressed in his earlier writings. His general observations about the methods of social reform are also clearer and more mature. There has recently been a little too much of twisting the tail of Hindu orthodoxy; and Gandhiji's advice against reviling orthodox Hindus is very opportune. If orthodox Hindus were really as pig-headed as their impatient critics allege, then, there is nothing else, for those who dissent from old customs, to do but to remove themselves bag and baggage out of it as Dr. Ambedkar and others of his way of thinking desire to do. But a dispassionate review of the progress of social ideas during the last half a century, shows that the Hindu community is not so entrenched in the old ways as to be impervious to reason in favour of making necessary adaptations. Naturally, it demands that those who advocate innovations, should test and prove that they do not endanger the sound and healthy parts of the social organism—for society is an organism and not a machine—and that they will add to its strength and vigour. Personal example, as Gandhiji says, is, therefore, the first duty of a reformer. We would add that the reformer, in setting a personal example, should scrupulously, and even over-scrupulously, respect susceptibilities and even prejudices of his society, that are harmless even though not quite rational. The greatest asset of the religious, social and national movement in this or any other country, is the personal character of its leaders. In fact, social reform or national progress, in the last analysis, is nothing but the elevation of the character of the individuals who constitute society. India has been most fortunate in the leadership of men of high intellectual and moral calibre. The Shastras do not prevent successive generations from changing social customs to suit the times. Society would not have endured if it had been a cast-iron system. Those who plead the Shastras against reforms really ask to be convinced that they are needed and are sure to strengthen society in dealing with new conditions.

Interdining and Intermarriage:—Interdining, as Gandhiji says, is best left to the tastes, inclinations or interests of individuals and there should be no compulsion. There is no law prohibiting interdining between members of different castes or creeds but except at hotels, restaurants, railway carriages and jails, it is not very common. The fact is, dining among Indians is regarded as a private and personal necessity of no importance as a means of promoting social intercourse. Many intimate friends seldom find it necessary to cement their friendship by taking their food in each other's company. On the whole, inter-dining would seem to be rather over-rated as a factor of social unity. However, as we said, there is no law to prevent a Brahmin from eating with a Pariah; and nowadays, when occasion needs, educated people make no difficulty about dining in the company of other castes. As for intermarriage, there should be no legal bar to a person of one caste marrying one of another caste. Actually at present, Gour's Act enables this to be done, and Babu Bhagwandas's Bill will, if passed, do away with the difficulties needlessly raised by the succession sections of that Act. But we are not sure it will be any good making intermarriages a plank in the national platform. Married happiness largely depends on how much wife and husband can take for granted in each other without having to thresh out every little question as it arises. As Gandhiji observes, while there should be no legal bar or social odium attaching to intermarriages between persons of different castes and sects, most marriages will continue to be celebrated between persons of analogous upbringing. To make out that a man or woman who marries out of the customary group, does more to advance the national interests than another who is content to choose a partner in his or her own class, is to look at the question from a wrong perspective. There is no demerit attaching to intermarriages nor is there any special merit either. The growth of a common standard of life, of education and social conduct, as Sir Govindrao observes, will naturally lead to the falling off of social distinctions. This is a slow process and "more haste, less speed" is a wise maxim to follow in such matters.

Society and the State:—We reprint in this issue the larger part of an interesting article in World's Youth, the quarterly review of the World's Alliance of Young Men's Christian Associations, published from Geneva, by Mr. Soichi Saito, National Secretary of the Y. M. C. A., in Japan. Mr. Saito's object in describing present day tendencies in Japanese family life, is to suggest how Christianity may be made acceptable to the people of Japan without affronting their deep-rooted family sentiment which he himself shares to a considerable extent. He recommends the stressing of such passages, mostly in the Epistles, which bear upon family life, with this object. Mr. Saito even interprets the passages in the Bible which have given rise to the controversy in these columns about Jesus's attitude to his mother, as proof of his considerateness to her and recommends that they should be taught as such in Christian propaganda in his country. Apart from this limited object, the article has a wider interest. For nearly a century we have had it impressed on us that India's political subjection is due to her social and family system, and many of us have unquestioningly adopted this view. It will be seen from Mr. Saito's account of the Japanese family that there is much in common between it and the Indian system. Even the joint family, which Mr. Pannikar regards as the main source of India's national weakness, is there. In spite of it, Japan today is one of the great world Powers whose competition in trade is as much feared as her strength in armaments. Surely, this should make us reflect whether the social or family system of a country is the chief determining factor of her political solidarity or her international status. Japan is not the only instance. Germany under the Empire was ruled by a caste and the strength behind Hitler, it has been noted by observers, is still derived from the same source. England itself has the reputation in Europe of being a caste-ridden country. The remarkable stability of France, a by-word for the instability of her Governments, rests on a family system not less rigid than that of Japan or China or India. Social reforms should be adopted for their own sake to render the movement of light and air and ideas free through the corridors of a nation's life, but, as a means to political or economic advancement, their influence would seem to be mostly derivative and indirect.

Trouble in Egypt:—The anti-British demonstrations in Egypt reported this week were not portended by any previous information about the causes leading to them, published in this country. No doubt, the developments in Ethiopia have stirred Egyptian nationalism both into sympathy with Ethiopia and into an acute consciousness of its own rights. The advantage of being a member of the League of Nations, has also become more attractive as a result of the world importance which the Italo-Ethiopian conflict has acquired owing to Ethiopia's membership of the League. It is also not improbable that Italian influence has something to do with the nationalist demonstrations against Britain. The application of the Wafdists, that Egypt should be admitted to the League, can not be taken official notice of as it does not emanate from a Government. But this technicality can be overcome if the Irish Free State, for instance, sponsors the application. Even Italy may do it as she continues to be a member. The Italian position has throughout been that she is following closely in the footsteps of Great Britain in her imperialistic ambitions; and Signor Mussolini must be enjoying the anti-British demonstrations in Egypt. To outsiders, Britain's opposition to the entry of Egypt into the League seems unaccountable. Surely Egypt is not less competent to govern herself than Iraq which Britain released from her mandate and got admitted to the League.

Tamarind:—Dr. McKroyd who has succeeded Dr. McCarrison as Director of Nutrition Research at the Coonoor Institute, in an interesting letter to Gandhiji on the food values of—neem (margosa) leaves and—the tamarind, remarks, "I can offer nothing in support of the popular belief that it induces fever and rheumatism." Gandhiji commenting in the current Harjan adds that in no case has he found it to have induced cold or rheumatism or boils as is believed by many. Richard Burton who lived in Sind like a native some fifty years ago, relates a prevalent belief in Sind that the tamarind tree, and not the fruit, brings on fever if one sleeps under it. After stating in the third volume of his monumental Arabian Nights, that the juice of the tamarind is taken with water as a drink, he adds, "Tamar-al-Hindi (Arabic), the Indian date, hence our tamarind. The traveller is advised not to sleep under the Tamarind's shade which is infamous for causing ague and fever. In Sind I derided the 'native superstition', passed the night under an Indian date-tree and awoke with a fine specimen of ague which lasted me a week."—Benares Edition, page 297, footnote. The fruit itself cannot be harmful because so many, in the South everyone as Gandhiji says, use it without any evil effect. In fact we have known some doctors recommending it to persons peculiarly susceptible to malaria.

Catholics and the War:—The halting diplomatic declarations of the Pope had given rise to an unfortunate impression that Catholics are inclined to take a neutral, non-committal attitude towards the Italian aggression on Ethiopia. This is, perhaps, true of the hierarchy, but popular opinion among Catholics as among all nations is dead against the action of the Italian Dictator. We reprint today a short and reasoned article from the Catholic Worker of New York which makes this clear.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

BOMBAY, November 23, 1935.

TRAFFIC IN WOMEN AND CHILDREN.

The League of Nations issued two years ago a bulky volume containing the Report of its Commission of Enquiry into Traffic in Women and Children in the East. It has decided to convene a Conference at Singapore next year to consider and deal with the recommendations of the Commission. A regional Conference to prepare the ground for the forthcoming Singapore Conference was held in Madras last week with the Bishop of Madras in the Chair. The Conference was opened by His Excellency the Governor of Madras. The Bishop pointed out that punitive measures of themselves can not cope with commercialised vice and that rescue work must be undertaken and carried out to a much larger extent than at present. The question arises, where are the workers to be found? The Bishop said, rescue work is a difficult and delicate problem and it requires very specially trained women. "That women who are willing to devote themselves to this difficult work are here in India," he added, "our initial endeavours have abundantly proved." Immediately, however, he went on to suggest that a worker should be engaged from Europe with the help of Government, to establish work on right lines and "to save us from the slow and wasteful process of learning by trial and error." The importation of experts from abroad to save ourselves the trouble of learning by trial and error, has led to enormous waste and loss without the benefit of it accruing to Indian workers. In Bombay we have merely to look around to see that this has been the case. Waste and error can not be avoided whether you employ a foreigner from Europe who has to learn Indian conditions by making mistakes or Indians whose mistakes become valuable experience which thereafter becomes indigenous. If, as the Bishop said, there are women in India who are willing to devote themselves to the work, it should not be difficult to get one of them to organise the work without extraneous assistance. Rescue work is not reclamation work. We have to deal with human beings and not with sand and cement. An Indian woman without proselytising proclivities, even if she is a novice, will start in this field with a great initial advantage over the trained European who does not understand India. We shall be told that it is better that an erring girl should become a convert than that she should continue in sin. But does conversion always ensure redemption? As Lord Erskine said in his opening remarks the evil is not confined to any one country or people. The brothel is the creation of an economic system having private profit for its principal incentive. This is the root factor and we are surprised that the good Bishop deprecated blaming those who make a profit by the trade. We agree if he meant it is not the individuals but the system that is to blame. The real remedy, it follows, is to change the system. The only country where the problem has been effectively dealt with so far, is Soviet Russia, where the very word prostitute is forbidden.

The Bishop further said, "It has to be recognised that very many of them (inmates of brothels) are engaged in it for economic reasons: for want of some other method of earning a livelihood, they have drifted or been forced into it. To deprive them of even this means of keeping body and soul together and to provide no outlet for them, is futile and cruel." The remedies His Lordship suggested was, first, a Central Home to which the rescued women can be sent in which they can learn to live useful lives, and be trained to earn their living in some respectable work. He asked the Municipalities and Government to provide funds for the Home as being more economical than providing more doctors, hospitals and nurses and at the same time to lose the potential earnings (and taxes) of a healthy population! The Bishop is making the same mistake as the Prohibitionists of the States who made much of the prosperity of the boom period, which followed the War, as proof of its value. When the inevitable depression came, the ground was cut from under their feet and the country reverted to its old policy in liquor. Why the Bishop should have preferred to insist on the economic value instead of on the essential injustice and immorality of the brothel system, we can not understand. Some future Minister may twist the Bishop's argument into a justification for taxing the earnings of brothels. Once this step is taken, the system will become entrenched in the fiscal system even like the liquor policy of "maximum revenue and minimum consumption." The analogy is not fanciful. The liquor traffic is intimately associated with the brothel system, so much so that it has been authoritatively stated that the one can not exist without the other. The ground lost by the Prohibition movement in this country, since the Ordinances were promulgated against peaceful picketing of liquor shops, is ground lost by the social purity movement. We trust that some one from India will urge this important aspect of the question before the Singapore Conference. The League of Nations has fought shy, so far, of grappling with the liquor traffic. Two years ago at Geneva this writer pressed this on the attention of the head of an organization close to the League of Nations, which was interested in counteracting the trade in drugs. He was assured that the suggestion would be considered, but nothing further has been heard about it. So far as International Traffic is concerned we have a comparatively clean slate. Chinese and Japanese women are the most important groups concerned in it. "Outside India," the Commission reported, "the Commission has found Indian prostitutes only in one of the territories revisited namely, in British Malaya." And even there the numbers were so small that it may be fairly stated that, generally speaking, Indian women are not victims of international traffic. Those few prostitutes of Indian origin who are in Malaya have reached there in the current of the existing considerable Indian emigration to that country.

JESUS AND MARY.

Much of the difficulty in understanding Jesus' attitude towards his mother disappears when it is realised that Jesus was an Oriental, to whom the mother aspect of woman overshadowed all others. His speech at the wedding-feast at Cana and his performance are in conflict, exactly as with the son in the parable who, after saying 'I will not' to his father, repented and worked in his vineyard. His rhetorical question, "Who is my mother? And who are my brothers?" seems to be a sorrowful recognition of the rejection of his message by those nearest to him. Jesus is, as 'T. A. L.' (Reformer, November 9th) remarks, asserting his individuality against family claims. But "T. A. L.'s" emphasis on the comparatively unimportant use of the word "Woman", whilst slurring over the more reprehensible "What have I got to do with thee," is an excellent example of straining at a gnat and swallowing a camel. Even so, I wonder whether 'T. A. L.' would feel exactly complimented if her son—if, as I take it, that writer is a woman—answered her in this manner. But is unnecessary to say, that many good Christians of today would be horrified if anyone in their society acted as Jesus did in Jewish society. Luther took a common sense view of life when he remarked that the Cleansing of the Temple ought not to be taken as an example. Nor is that the only incident in the life of Jesus to show that he was a man as well as a prophet. And it is surely too much to claim that "for thirty years he was true to his family obligations." I wonder has 'T. A. L.' forgotten the child who tarried in Jerusalem and rebuked his parents for sorrowing for him on the grounds of a higher tie? The apocryphal gospels which might be considered to throw some light at least on the life and teachings of Jesus, narrate an interesting episode in the early life of Jesus which apparently was not a tranquil period for his parents. Alarmed at the sudden deaths which overtook his young companions who crossed him in the village sports, the neighbours went in deputation, runs the story, to Joseph, saying, "If thou wouldst live with us, teach thy child to bless and not to curse." Joseph, worried by constant complaints, caught the young Jesus angrily by the ear and was solemnly rebuked by his son for doing so. "It is enough for you to see me," said Jesus according to the Apostle Thomas, the realist disciple who could not believe in the resurrection till he touched Jesus (John, XX, 25); "not to touch me. For you know not who I am; but if thou didst know, thou wouldst not make me angry. And although just now I am with you, yet was I made before you." (A. Walker's "Apocryphal Gospels, Acts and Revelations" page 79; M. R. James' "The Apocryphal New Testament" page 60.) There can be no denying the fact that throughout his life Jesus was fighting against the family system. "For I am come," said Jesus in instructing his apostles (Mathew, X, 35), "to set a man at variance against his father, and the daughter against her mother, and the daughter-in-law against her mother-in-law," and went on to add, "A man's foes shall be they of his own household." The struggle with himself, however, was greater than the difficulty of breaking with his relatives.

And this was rendered all the more intense because his mother, Mary, in spite of his almost studied attempts to shake her off, persisted in watching over him, even though she, as a devout Jew, must have felt spiritually hurt at some of his preachings. On the Cross, Jesus realises the great mistake of his life. Forsaken by his disciples, betrayed by one of them and denied by another, he must have been strengthened in his own faith in the parental love of God by the sight of his mother who was steadfast in her devotion to him. The flight of those whom he had elevated to the position of 'brothers' must have completely disillusioned him.—Their weak faith needed the seal of the Resurrection. How were they better than the scribes and Pharisees whom Jesus had denounced for seeking a sign?—In his admonition to John, Jesus both entrusts a charge and repudiates his past conduct to his mother. And he goes back to a human tie the strength of which he had underestimated before. "When Jesus saw his mother and the disciple standing by whom he loved, he saith unto his mother, "Woman, behold thy Son!" Then he saith to the disciple, "Behold thy Mother!" And from that hour that disciple took her unto his own home." Thus John the beloved disciple describing the spiritual reunion of Jesus and his Mother.

JESUS AND HIS MOTHER.

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

With reference to the discussion now going on in connection with Jesus' way of addressing his mother, I beg to write the following with your kind permission.

The matter is very simple if it is looked at from the Hindu point of view. In other words, Jesus had become a Sannyasi i. e. a man who had given up the world including all his relatives by blood etc., and hence he would not recognise his mother and brothers as such. This has been the case in India for ages, and some teachers have gone to the length of calling it a sin to have any recognition of such relationships. Such Sadhus and Sannyasis bury their past entirely and they are forbidden even to speak of it. Jesus did the same and so was done by Paul. Both of them changed their names, e. g., Jesus called himself Son of Man and Saul become Paul. Both of them were civilly and socially dead. Now a thing like this was so new to both the Jews and the Gentiles that they naturally overlooked it. It is no wonder then that such an outstanding Jewish teacher as Dr. Montefiore should blame Jesus for this apparent lack of courtesy to his mother, and Jesus is blameable unless we remember that he belonged to a different order of life by his Sannyas. Your correspondent T. A. L. has forgotten the fact that however high the idea of "woman" may be in the mind of Jesus, the idea of "Mother" is the crown of womanhood. But Jesus as a Sadhu had neither mother nor father, and he did not want to be recognised any more as the son of Mary or Joseph. If we look at it from this point of view, there is no harshness whatsoever. However, the fundamental objection on the part of the Jews to the recognition of Jesus lies deeper, and this was made clear to me by a Jew whom I met in America. He said to me that Jesus was different from Moses and Abraham inasmuch as he did not marry and live in the world, and so he could not be an exemplar. In other words Jesus denies the world and Judaism affirms it. Now there is no denying the fact that Jesus does deny the world, and very definitely too. Herein he is more like Mahavir and Buddha and the Christianity of both Jesus and Paul comes very near in this matter to Jainism and Buddhism, and it is very different from Judaism and Islam. I have always felt that Jainism, Buddhism and Christianity are the three most spiritual and universal religions of the world, but this is true of these religions at their best. Of these Christianity has become very worldly and carnal and Mr. H. Kraemhar from whose article you quote in your issue of the 9th instant is quite right in saying that the present day Christianity is European Imperialism. I defined it as Europeanism several years ago, and I am thankful that this is being realised more and more.

Whether the denial of the world is better than its affirmation is a much bigger question than can be discussed here, and all that I would say is that it is this denial which has given to the world its two greatest men—Gautama Buddha and Jesus Christ.

Rajkot, Yours etc.,

[The Sannyas explanation is surely rather forced. Except in the case of his mother Jesus moved freely with women. Hindu monasticism, on the other hand, allowed a departure from the strict rule of dis-association with women in the case only of the mother.—Ed., I. S. R.]

THE FAMILY AND MARRIAGE.

It is generally believed that youth everywhere is in revolt. And the less known objects against which they revolt, have been a fertile field for the thesis writer. European and American research writers, and even some of our advanced Asiatic nations, have learnt that their young men are dissatisfied with the family and even with marriage. It was to be expected that Indians would follow this lead. Mr. K. T. Merchant's 'Changing Views on Marriage and Family (Hindu Youth)' which is his thesis for the M. A. degree of Bombay University revised, and published by B. G. Paul & Co., (price Rs 3-8-0), is pioneer work in this sphere. Like all pioneers he is inclined to go a little too fast. Mr. Merchant set about his work by distributing a questionnaire among the students. The response was so poor—only 676 replied of the 3,800 approached and of these 78 were rejected as of a 'doubtful nature'—that one is likely to conclude that Mr. Merchant was not taken very seriously by university students in this presidency. That it would be unwarranted is conclusively proved by the list of professors and others whom Mr. Merchant thanks in his preface for distributing the questionnaire. The only possible conclusion is that the 85 per cent who were silent were satisfied with things as they are and did not feel the disadvantages to be so irksome as to justify a demand for drastic change. The reason for this is not difficult to conjecture. The university student is, in India at any rate, generally of a class which requires protection for its young till the 21st year at the least. You cannot gather in university degrees if you have to support a family at the same time or even earn your own living. There are no doubt exceptions but Mr. Merchant sought not the exceptional but the average among students. If it is true that many leaders in Indian life were able to devote themselves to public work because of the joint family, it is even more so with our scholars. It is Mr. Ginsberg's ignorance of this fundamental fact of Indian social life that has led him to commend this book as a careful study which does not go beyond the evidence. On the strength of the 3,000 odd who did not send in their returns, the conclusion that Hindu youth are against the joint family system and desire an urgent reform of the marriage custom, seems out of place. There is nothing to show that Hindu youth today, any more than in the past, are actively interested in bringing on the changes indicated by Mr. Merchant in the book. On the contrary there is everything to indicate that the vast mass of them will, after protests in varying degrees of intensity, accommodate themselves to existing conditions, whatever they may be. If Mr. Merchant succeeds in introducing the Utopia which he sketches out in the last chapter, the three thousand silent ones will still be as indifferent as they are today. There are some interesting facts which Mr. Merchant's figures for Bombay, Gujarat and Poona, reveal about the university students so far as one can conclude anything from these meagre statistics. Sixty-eight per cent of Poona university men are neither married nor betrothed as against 44·8 in Bombay and 33·9 in Gujarat. This may mean either that the Poona young man postpones marriage till after graduation more frequently than the Bombay or Gujarat under-graduate, or that the wives of Bombay and Gujarat university students allow their husbands more liberty in answering questionnaires than they do in Poona. Bombay leads in the matter of betrothals which possibly means that the custom is more prevalent in this city. But these facts do not prove or disprove Mr. Merchant's theory. Mr. Merchant's quotations from modern writers at the conclusion show the reader that he has definitely set out to expound his ideas of what should be done to reform Hindu society and has utilised the few who answered his questionnaire as a peg to hang his views on. Even if no one had responded, this thesis would still have been written. As an exposition of Mr. Merchant's views it is interesting. But as a study of what middle-class, higher caste, Hindu youth think it is of little value.

THE PRESENT TENDENCIES IN THE JAPANESE FAMILY.*

(BY SOICHI SAITO.)

In the summer of 1933, when I had the pleasure at a luncheon given by Senator Quezon of sitting next to him, I ventured to ask what would be the basic principle of education of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands when it came to enjoy complete independence. To my surprise his immediate reply was, "It would be based upon the family system."

Last July in Moscow I was much interested in the remark made by one of the authorities on contemporary Soviet Russia to the effect that Stalin has lately been paying a great deal of attention to the family problem in Russia, following on a particular experiment which was carried on for a decade or so in that country.

A friend of mine in England, upon learning that I was engaged in a study of the Japanese family system, advised me to make a comparative study of family systems such as the Greek, Roman, Indian, and our own. Such a comprehensive study needs more time and further research. Let me, however, take up the subject which has been assigned to me as above and discuss it under the following three headings:

- I. Characteristics of the Japanese Family System.
- II. Present Tendencies in the Japanese Family.
- III. Their Bearing on our Christian Work and Message.

In order to understand our family system two things must be kept in mind. First, the New Japan emerged out of her feudal system only sixty-seven years ago. The year 1868 was the first year of the Meiji Era, a first page of the history of New Japan. In the second place, Japan has had to go through in less than three-quarters of a century almost all the processes which took more than two or even three centuries in other parts of the world; take, for instance, change from the feudal system to a constitutional monarchy, industrial revolution, westernization, and the world economic crisis. In such a short space of time Japan, after having had periods of testing, has joined the family of nations.

Now, the basic idea of the Japanese family is the relationship between parents and children, not between man and wife. Our respect for "the name of family," which means the permanency of the family line, is of primary importance. Consequently this creates the family spirit. In the West the central consideration of the family may be the question of marriage or divorce, while in Japan it is the problem of inheritance. In other words, the western family is constructed by the horizontal relation of husband and wife, while the Japanese system is centralized in the vertical relationship of ancestor, father and son.

In order to realize the permanent succession of the family line, transmission of the family tradition becomes another important matter. For example, in some conservative traditional families the same personal name is carried on generation after generation. Furthermore, in the days gone by, the Samurai, or military family, was always succeeded by the Samurai, merchant by merchant, and farmer by farmer, which shows the transmission of the family tradition by means of profession. Of course, this has undergone a great modification in our day on account of changing economic and social conditions. However, in certain families the succession of family professions is observed even now. Therefore in the Japanese family a revolt against family tradition has been considered one of the most disgraceful things. In the majority of divorce cases, for instance, the reason put forward is that a wife does not conform to her husband's family tradition, or that an adopted son has failed to adjust himself to a particular family tradition.

The permanency of the family line and its name necessitates the first son being the most important person among the children. According to the usual custom the eldest son inherits the entire property of his ancestor upon the death of the head of the family. Special privileges are given to the eldest son in the matter of education and treatment at home. But, on the other hand, he is always under obligation to observe the principle of the family tradition, and oftentimes he has to inherit not only the property but also the profession or business of his forefathers. He has not only to look after his own children, but, if necessary, his brothers' or sisters' children also.

As such duties are required of the head of the family, either in the father and son or husband and wife relationships, so great authority is given to him. In respect of marriage or choice of profession the voice of the head of the family is final.

Another characteristic of the Japanese family system may be found in the intimate relationship between the relatives. Not only has the head of the family the obligation to look after his parents, his wife, and his own children, but by Japanese law he is obliged to help his distant relatives up to the consanguinity of the sixth degree; that is, up to the second cousin.

According to a survey which has been carried out in the northern part of Japan, there still exist many traditional large families. For example, in one family, fifty-seven individuals are living together, including seven sons with their wives and children and also a few distant relatives. They live in separate rooms or in smaller units. At dinner time all the members of the family gather in a large dining room, which is usually situated in the central portion of the building, and which is also used as a sort of social lobby. In such a large family, distinction between the head of the family and the other members is clearly established. The absolute power is vested in the head of the family and the other members are always unified by his authority.

Another unique feature of the Japanese family system is ancestor worship, which comes as a consequence of the preservation of the family line. Just as the children go to the father and mother each morning to pay respect with a morning's greeting, so do the members of the family worship the spirits of their ancestors. The conception of our Royal Family may well be explained in this connection. Our Emperor is considered to be the Head of all the families in Japan. In other words, our Imperial family is the centre of the families in Japan, and the individual families are the branches from the same tree. Hence, the cardinal virtues in Japanese ethics are loyalty to the Emperor and filial piety to our parents.

The family system of Japan is the bulwark and foundation of her national life. Upon this structure her social, cultural, ethical, and religious life has been built up. In recent years, however, it was not free from the influence of various tendencies, and many changes have been in evidence. An attempt has been made to carry out some research into the Japanese family system, and thousands of opinions regarding the general attitude on the social practices of our family system have been collected. According to the replies given by 7,575 people of over forty years of age, the majority show a favourable attitude towards the family system as it is. For instance, the questions to which the consensus of opinion has been agreed upon are as follows:

1. Children must get their parents' approval when they marry.
2. Newly weds should live with parents.
3. Parents should arrange the marriages of their children, who are young and inexperienced.
4. Ancestral worship is a good feature of the family system.
5. It is wise to adopt a child in order to perpetuate the family line.
6. It is absolutely wrong to divorce a wife because she has no child.
7. If the head of the house is unable to support his family, his relatives must attempt to do so.
8. When the branch house is in distress the main house must support it.
9. Ideal family life can be achieved only when the head of a house has the ruling hand.
10. Free association of men and women is apt to corrupt society.

On the other hand, their unfavourable attitudes are expressed by the following views:

1. Marriages should be carried out without parent's approval.
2. The motive for marriages should be love and not the bearing of children.
3. The divorced wife has the right to take her child with her when she leaves.
4. Both husband and wife should manage their property.
5. It is wrong to distinguish between the main house and the branch house and to give authority to the former.

From these conclusions one may clearly see that the general tendency of opinion among the older generation is to preserve very distinctly the continuity of the family line.

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Nov. 23

We have also explored the same subject amongst one thousand universities and college students, and an analytical study of their replies reveals that there is a strong expression of individualism which is the general fundamental basis for modern civilization. They do not accept all the views which are favourably agreed upon by the older generation. For example, the latter approved such opinions as "Children must get their parents' approval when they marry," "Free association of men and women is apt to corrupt society", and "Ideal family life can be achieved only when the head of the family has the ruling hand." However, these views do not meet with the agreement of the former. On the contrary, the younger generation has agreed upon such conceptions as "Marriages should be carried out without the parents' approval," "The motive of marriage should be love but not the bearing of children," and "It is wrong to distinguish between the main house and the branch house and to give authority to the former."

The above mentioned facts will explain by themselves the conflict of ideas between the younger and older generations of our day. On the one hand, the older people who are controlling present society show, comparatively speaking, a favourable attitude towards the traditional family system and are eager to maintain it. On the other hand, younger people who will be the leaders of tomorrow are desiring to change this time-honoured system and are in favour of establishing a new social institution based upon individualism. Moreover, there are extreme cases of students who agree with the advocacy of communism, with special reference to the family system. There is indeed a crisis of the family system in Japan.

THE GURUKULA UNIVERSITY HARDWAR.

Thirty-four years ago, the Gurukula Kangri was founded by Swami Shraddhanand on the 24th of February 1902. This institution is the oldest and the best of its kind. Though controlled by the Arya Pratinidhi Sabha, Punjab, it is an All India institution, in which students hail not only from the Punjab, but also from the United Provinces, Gujarat, Rajputana, Central Provinces, Behar, Bengal and even from far off places like Madras, Burma and Africa. At present there are some Harijan boys also studying in the Gurukula.

The Gurukula has already developed into a university. Above three lakhs of rupees have been spent on its buildings. The distinctive feature of the institution is that it admits boys at the tender age of seven or eight, keeps them safe from the harmful atmosphere of city life and imparts to them the ancient Vedic culture. Brahmacharya is the life breath of the Gurukula. Admitted at a very impressionable age, Brahmacharis reside here for fourteen years and during this period, while on the one hand, they acquire a profound knowledge of the Vedas, the Upanishads, the six Darshanas, Vyakarna, Nirukta and Sanskrit literature, on the other, there is satisfactory provision for the efficient teaching of modern subjects, such as western Philosophy, History, Chemistry, Economics, Comparative study of Religions and English literature. The Gurukula is an independent and unaffiliated institution and it gives its own degrees. Its students not only far surpass the students of affiliated colleges in the possession of the ancient Vedic culture of which the majority outside are entirely innocent, but they also compare very favourably with them in the mastery of modern subjects in which, Hindi being the medium of instruction, they acquire a high degree of proficiency. By writing classical works, such as Vedic Vinay, Nirukta, Veda Bhashya and Indian History the Gurukula graduates have rendered most valuable service to the cause of Hindi and won an honourable place among the writers of the mother tongue.

By repeatedly winning trophies for several years consecutively in the All India Inter University debates held annually on the occasion of the convocation of the Benares Hindu University, its students have indisputably proved themselves to be powerful and eloquent speakers. Some of its graduates have gone out to Germany, England and America and with little difficulty they have been able to achieve distinction in their respective lines. This institution inculcates in its students the lessons of patriotism, fearlessness, courage, independence, service of humanity and respect for Indian culture.

To solve the problem of livelihood, the Gurukula has started a first class Ayurvedic college, in which the teaching of the ancient Ayurveda goes hand in hand with the teaching of Allopathy. There is adequate arrangement for the teaching of dissection and surgery as well. For lack of funds, it has not yet been possible to start a Technical Institute to teach students the arts for which they have a natural aptitude and thus enable them to stand on their own legs. The scheme for a first rate Technical Institute can be realised only if generous donors give liberal contributions for the purpose.

The annual expenditure of the whole institution is about one lakh and sixty thousand out of which nearly half is met by the maintenance fee received from the guardians of Brahmacharis, but the rest is defrayed by public charity. Generous donors have not failed in their duty when the Gurukula people have gone out to them for funds. This year the deputation of the Gurukula consisting of Professor Indra, Editor 'Arjun' and Professor Satyavrata, Governor Gurukula Kangri, is visiting Bombay by the end of November and it is hoped the public of this city will liberally contribute to the Gurukula fund.

HINDUISM AND CASTE.

The recent announcement of Ambedkar that he will not die a Hindu has caused a flutter in the dovecots. Whether he emerges as President of the Mahasabha or a convert to some other creed is a matter in which the average Hindu has no say and may not hazard opinion or counsel. He may at the most regret, understanding and sympathising with his attitude of revolt and bitterness, yet certain and thankful that Hinduism will survive and might even, from some points of view, gain by his secession.

From the days of Ram Mohan Roy and Dayanand Saraswati, liberal and far-sighted Hindu leaders on this side as Bhandarkar, Ranade and Gokhale have been inviting the attention of Hindus to the weaknesses of the caste system, of which untouchability is an extreme form, and have been pressing us to set our own house in order. The various Samajas and Missions such as the Depressed Classes Mission in Poona and now the Harijan Movement of Mahatma Gandhi have been doing their best. But Rome was not built in a day. We are dealing with an institution centuries old, with a conservative, superstitious and vast community, illiterate as far as the women and the masses are concerned. The attitude of Government was in theory a benevolent, in practice a futile, neutrality. And with the increased poverty and struggle for existence and competition for posts under Government, the administrative and statutory recognition of the backward castes, combined with separate electorates, has rendered the work of the social reformer even more difficult than before.

As one of the oldest members of the Presidency Social Reform Association, I fear I must make the admission that 'too late' is an appropriate motto in regard to the attitude of us Hindus to Social Reform. We refuse to face the question fairly and squarely. We shirk to give a plain answer and to act upon it. We take refuge in phrases and quibbles, and subtleties which serve to exasperate rather than to solve. An outburst, and we act like frightened sheep—an unedifying and a humiliating attitude for any self-respecting community. In one very real sense, economically and politically, we are all of us equally depressed. But the poorer and the weaker we grow, the more we display, failing aught else, pride of caste.

The plain issue before us Hindus is whether today we are or are not in favour of social intercourse and, above all, of intermarriage between all castes of Hindus, including the untouchables. On this vital question only one of two positions is consistent and possible. One position is to accept caste as a divine and a sacrosanct institution, above and beyond the pale of worldly considerations. And no benefits, whether eugenic or social, economic or political, from intermarriage can be allowed to affect the maintenance and the permanence of caste. As in the theory of Hindu Law, orthodoxy may concede that only four castes and the untouchables should exist. But since it is impossible in practice to go back to these five only, the concession is more apparent than real.

This is in fact the Sanatanist position and answer. It ignores the fact pointed out by scholars, such as Bhandarkar, that the most ancient Vedas give no countenance to untouchability and allow intermarriage between castes which were a later growth. It overlooks the fact that, whatever its origin, today caste does not correspond and is not related with economic realities such as division of labour or, in some cases, even with real culture and education.

The other position is that of the social reformer who is not ashamed either of his name or his convictions and of their logical consequence. Whatever its origin and its growth, caste is a human institution which has existed in other countries and has been modified by human agency, conscious and unconscious. In India, on the contrary, it has grown to monstrous dimensions, undreamt of elsewhere. It divides and weakens Hindus and, like a cancerous growth, absorbs all the vital forces to itself at the expense of the community.

The Joint Parliamentary Select Committee has, and with some justice, characterised caste as "inconsistent with democratic principles." But even today the public utterances of leading Hindus on this point are not quite clear any more than the attitude of the Congress or the Mahasabha. I do not belong to either organisation and have no pretensions to lead. But I am and have been clear in favour of intermarriage. As to untouchability, I cannot conceive how God can impose upon the Hindu Community so absurd and suicidal a law that an untouchable so remains only as long as he remains a Hindu, but becomes touchable the moment he leaves the Hindu fold. Other countries and communities exist and have progressed without caste and so can Hindus. The Heavens will not fall with it.

For the root evil, the appalling poverty whether of the cultivator or of the untouchable, the solution must be economic and political. But equality in the sight of the law already exists. Equal opportunity of education in schools, maintained by public funds, can and should be conceded, whatever the objections of the orthodox. But even here in regard to the use of wells, the prejudice and resistance exist mainly in the villages and on the part of non-Brahmins such as Patidars in Gujarat, Marathas in Maharashtra and Lingayats in Karnatak. And as a police force in each village to enforce equality is not practical, the only alternative just at present would appear to be that the touchables in any village, who object to the use of their wells by the untouchables, should be made by law to provide for a proper separate well for the untouchables. And as to temple entry, I would suggest, in the case of public temples, early legislation, throwing them open to all Hindus including untouchables on a perfect footing of equality, overriding any custom or trust, express or implied, prohibiting any section of Hindus from entry to the main building as distinguished from the inner shrine, reserved for the worshipping priest.

But the untouchables, not less than the non-Brahmins and Brahmins, are, like all Hindus, tarred with the same brush and observe caste as rigorously among themselves, as, for instance, the Dheds and the Bhangis in Gujarat, and the Mahars, the Chamars and the Mangs in Maharashtra. The question for the untouchables is, therefore, the same, and it behoves their leaders, while pressing for equality, not merely to abuse the Caste Hindus, but also to encourage intermarriage and social reform among themselves. Lastly, I would remark that legislation may forbid or permit but cannot impose social intercourse or intermarriage. These must grow out of equal standards, culture and sympathy and work in common ideals, rather than from abuse or political motives.

I would appeal to Hindu leaders such as Mahatma Gandhi, Pandit Malaviya, Mr. N. C. Kelkar, Mr. B. V. Jadhav and the Hon. Dewan Bahadur Kamli to give us a clear and a courageous lead on this vital question.

G. D. MADGAVKAR.

CASTE HAS TO GO.*

I gladly publish Sir Govindrao Madgavkar's open letter. My own position has been often stated in these columns. It may be summed up as follows:

1. I believe in Varnashrama of the Vedas which in my opinion is based on absolute equality of status, notwithstanding passages to the contrary in the Smritis and elsewhere.
2. Every word of the printed works passing muster as 'Shastras' is not, in my opinion, a revelation.
3. The interpretation of accepted texts has undergone evolution and is capable of indefinite evolution, even as the human intellect and heart are.
4. Nothing in the Shastras which is manifestly contrary to universal truths and morals can stand.
5. Nothing in the Shastras which is capable of being reasoned can stand if it is in conflict with reason.
6. Varnashrama of the Shastras is today non-existent in practice.
7. The present caste system is the very antithesis of Varnashrama. The sooner public opinion abolishes it the better.
8. In Varnashrama there was and should be no prohibition of intermarriage or interdining. Prohibition there is of change of one's hereditary occupation for purposes of gain. The existing practice is therefore doubly wrong in that it has set up cruel restrictions about interdining and intermarriage and tolerates anarchy about choice of occupation.

9. Though there is in Varnashrama no prohibition against intermarriage and interdining, there can be no compulsion. It must be left to the unfettered choice of the individual as to where he or she will marry or dine. If the law of Varnashrama was observed there would naturally be a tendency, so far as marriage is concerned, for people to restrict the marital relations to their own Varna.

10. As I have repeatedly said there is no such thing as untouchability by birth in the Shastras. I hold the present practice to be a sin and the greatest blot on Hinduism. I feel more than ever that if untouchability lives, Hinduism dies.

11. The most effective, quickest, and the most unobtrusive way to destroy caste is for reformers to begin the practice with themselves and where necessary take the consequences of social boycott. The reform will not come by reviling the orthodox. The change will be gradual and imperceptible. The so-called higher classes will have to descend from their pedestal before they can make any impression upon the so-called lower classes. Day-to-day experience of village work shows how difficult the task is of bridging the gulf that exists between the city-dwellers and the villagers, the higher classes and the lower classes. The two are not synonymous terms. For the class distinction exists both in the cities and the villages.

M. K. GANDHI.

CONVERSION NO REMEDY.*

I was very grieved to hear of your decision to give up Hinduism. Please don't misunderstand me. As a matter of fact, I care a straw whether Hinduism lives or not. I shall not worry myself, if all the organised religions disappear from the face of the earth. Whatever is noble in the teachings and ideals presented to the world by the great teachers of humanity from the beginning of the world will endure. No one need, therefore, shed a tear over the fate of any particular religion.

What grieves me, however, is that the step you propose to take would hardly remove the disabilities of your community. No mere change in name will wipe off untouchability or unapproachability. You cannot have had first-hand knowledge of Malabar; your experience about conversion also is perhaps confined to individual cases. How wholesale conversions affect the status of a community, I can tell you from experience. In Travancore, whole villages of Harijans have embraced Christianity. Those Christian Paraiyahs and Christian Pulayats still continue to be unapproachable and untouchables in their new surroundings. They have their separate Churches—small sheds befitting their status in society. Conversion has not materially benefitted them. Some of them have even revolted and formed a separate church of their own.

Those who got themselves converted to Islam too have fared no better. In Ponnani, a place sacred to Malabar Muslims, there is a vast community of fishermen Muslims, converts from local Hindus and they form a separate class by themselves.

We can well understand why it is so. An individual convert is soon assimilated into the main body, but a whole community differing from the bulk of the community they have joined in point of education, wealth, culture and status cannot be assimilated like that. They remain distinct and carry all their old disabilities with them into the community they join.

*Mr. K. Kelappan, Editor "Mathabbumi" has addressed the above letter to Dr. Ambedkar.

Even conceding the possibility of wholesale conversion, the new converts would just add one more sect to the community they join. But can we be sure that an appreciable percentage of Harijans can be persuaded to give up their present religion, whatever it be? I should think not. And what will be the net result of your conversion? Yourself and a few thousands, let us say, of the educated men in the community, who are even otherwise able to hold their own against others, will give up Hinduism and will cease to be of any more use to the bulk of your community remaining behind. The bulk of your brethren will continue to be Harijans and Hindus, kicked and driven away even from public roads. That is a state of affairs which must make you pause, and think again before you make your final decision.

Mere change of religion cannot help them. I do not see even any wide-spread movement among Christians or Muslims to do away with the distinctions of class and caste among them. Supposing Harijans get themselves converted to Christianity or Islam, the same uphill work, you will still have to do to bring into being a movement to remove the disabilities of the new converts. But, in the Hindu fold, by the huge amount of work already done and the great sacrifices made, the conscience of the Caste Hindus has been to a considerable extent already awakened. The thinking sections among them have become alive to the injustices done in the name of religion, and are up in arms against such injustices. Every where efforts are being made to do away with these iniquitous customs. You do not certainly belittle the volume of attention that is being focussed on this problem by Gandhiji and his followers. It has already begun to bear fruit. Will you spurn us all and turn your back on the movement which many of us are prepared to promote even at the sacrifice of our lives? I quite realise your indignation and despair. I have often said to myself that in front of Guruvayur temple, I shall convert thousands of Harijans to Islam and lead them along temple roads with the cry of 'Allah-Ho-Akbar.' The very next moment I realise it is a counsel of despair and that it will not avail. There is, as you know, no royal road to equality.

I shall never ask you to be patient or to wait. We shall all put our heads together to find a solution and we shall work steadily and persistently till these evils completely disappear. To throw the blame for the present state of affairs on any section of the Hindu community is unjust, as all are equally conservative and equally guilty in maintaining them.

I would therefore request you as a friend and worker in the cause to advise the young men who think that burning Manusmriti and Bhagavat Geeta will solve the problem to take up the fight and continue it until we reach our goal.

NATIONALISM IN MODERN TURKEY.

The Report of the Foreign Policy Association of New York for October deals with the development of the Turkish Republic during the last twelve years. It sums up the result as follows:—

In the face of seemingly insurmountable obstacles, Turkey has made remarkable progress during the twelve years of the Republican regime. First-hand observers of Turkey continually remark on the rapidity with which the Turks are assimilating Western methods and civilization. In the political sphere a purely national, sovereign state, commanding the loyalty of its people and the respect of other nations, has been created. The social programme of the government has made definite progress in popular education and the emancipation of women. Health and living conditions have also been improved. In the financial sphere, Turkey has adjusted its foreign obligations and by instituting a policy of "pay as you go" in its internal affairs has strengthened its credit abroad. Economically, the new regime is revolutionizing agriculture and establishing industry in an effort to become self-sufficient in manufactured goods. On the other hand, economic nationalism, restriction of foreign trade, heavy appropriations for national defense, and the Government's internal financial policy are at present the major difficulties which beset the Turkish people in their attempt to gain economic and political security. The first stage of the Turkish revolution has been effectively completed. The final stage, that of consolidation, is now in progress.

With regard to the measures for consolidating nationalism, the Report says: Turkey has accepted nationalism with unusual rapidity and completeness. Education, the most important vehicle for its inculcation, was nationalized and secularized by the law of March 1924. Since then various restrictions have been placed on foreign schools, which have made it difficult or impossible for them to exist. Turkish children must be taught in the government primary schools, where new textbooks and government-trained teachers inculcate the national ideals, the new Turkish language, history and civics. These schools are increasing both in number and efficiency. The new language written in Latin characters, has tended to eliminate all vernacular languages and dialects, and has had the effect of binding the people together. Other ramifications of nationalism, such as the glorification of Turkish folk-lore and legend, the substitution of Turkish for Ottoman, Arabic and foreign words, symbolical displays of the flags, crescent and star, national holidays and ceremonies, and display of likenesses of Ataturk strengthen loyalty and devotion to the State. This patriotism has arisen without any particular subsoil of Turkish tradition, common language, feelings of racial origin or recognition of cultural unity—the usual components of nationalistic attitudes. These elements have been applied from the top; and the effect, although superficial, is apparently no different from the nationalism so rampant in other countries.

Turkish nationalism was first consolidated by abolishing the competing loyalties. Homage to religion and its acolytes, which might divert a people from single-minded devotion to the national state, was impaired by the overthrow of the Caliphate and the gradual dissolution of Islamic power. The abolition of the Sultanate represented an attempt to destroy allegiance to an individual. Minorities with national aspirations which still remained within the boundaries of Turkey as defined by the National Pact were eliminated by exchange and suppression. The exhaustion of the people and the strength of the dictator accounted for the success of these drastic moves, although Ataturk had discovered that the elements of reaction and fanaticism in Ottoman Turkey possessed no real influence of their own. Suppression of religious, Ottoman and minority allegiances has not had uniform effects. Although stern measures have been applied to destroy the power of the priesthood, and the state still retains the right to interfere in religious matters, the regime has practiced tolerance to some degree. Ataturk is opposed only to those features of religion which he regards as backward, or as interfering with the complete dedication of the citizen to the nation. Islam must conform to the nationalist programme. Such resistance to the regime as still persists is centred in the mosque, particularly in the outlying regions where Moslem habits remain firmly entrenched. All religious titles have been abolished, no head and no sectional leaders of Islam remain in Turkey. The mosque with its kodja or priest is an individual unit, having no relation to a diocese or any other mosque. This decentralization of Islamic control makes it impossible for any reactionary movement to gather momentum, for Islam is now a body without a head, and the body is slowly dying for lack of guidance and trained leaders.

Although religious reaction is almost non-existent at the present time, allegiance to an individual has not disappeared. The Turkish people's hero-worship of Ataturk assumes such proportions that it sometimes obscures patriotism for the Turkish nation. This substitution of allegiance is not without danger to a national state, for the intense loyalty to the nation which the combination of Ataturk and the republic now inspires might cease to exist without the personality which is its focal point. The outstanding quality of Ataturk is his sincere patriotism and his desire to revivify his country. Personal ambition is completely identified with Turkey's ambition. At present his retention of dictatorial power appears necessary for the consolidation of the Turkish revolution.

In the case of the minority nationalities, the programme of suppression has been extraordinarily effective. The strength of the nationalistic feeling was mostly exemplified by the thoroughness and zeal with which the Turks rid themselves of the "strangers within their gates." Besides their desire for racial and religious homogeneity, the Turks had two other motives: to leave in Turkey no source of reaction, and to give foreign powers no excuse for intervention. During the War the Greeks living in the neighbourhood of the north-western littoral were evacuated, while the Armenians were massacred and driven into the desert. As a result of the exchange of populations programme, over 1,200,000 Greeks and Armenians left the country, while some 500,000 Moslems were brought in.

The latest official census of 1927 shows fewer than 27,000 Greeks living in Turkey, mostly in Istanbul and Izmir; Armenians number about 10,000. Some 11,000 Italians, 6,000 Russians, and 17,000 other foreigners comprise the balance of the alien population—a mere one-half of one per cent. Over 97 per cent of the inhabitants follow the teachings of the Koran, while at least 86 per cent speak the Turkish language.

However, the Kurdish people living in Turkey bring the total of minority nationalities up over a million. They are concentrated in the southeast corner around the vilayet of Hakari, speak their own language, and profess a fanatical type of Moslem worship. During the World War an incoherent national sentiment appeared among these uneducated and unconquered tribesmen. The treaty of Sevres had made allowance for Kurdish nationalism, but the northern Kurds were incorporated into Turkey by the treaty of Lausanne. Angered by the coercive measures of the government and impelled by a vague desire to establish a republic between Van and Mosul, the Kurds rebelled in 1925. The revolt was suppressed with great difficulty, but it served as a rallying point for patriotic sentiment in Turkey, and although it called for such harsh precautions as gagging the press, it helped to solidify the nation. The process of turkifying the Kurdish regions has steadily continued.

One of the major policies of the People's party and the Republic during the last nine years has been the encouragement of public education.

tion. A promising start was made with the reform of the educational system in 1926 but this applied only to the children of the nation. To reduce illiteracy, to make the people understand the causes and results of the revolution and to instil a national spirit was far more difficult. This adult education was vitally necessary for the well-being and even the existence of the new Turkey; for, although ten million peasants knew in a vague way that they had won liberty and freedom, they had, on the other hand, seen their Caliph expelled, their religion undermined, and their fez taken away. To reach these people in any other way than by personal contact was virtually impossible. Of a population totaling approximately fourteen million, 1,751,239 families or 9,216,918 individuals were engaged in tilling the soil for a living—about two-thirds of the nation. The average population of the 40,191 cities, towns and villages was only 333, and the density of the population per square kilometer was 17.9. Both by vocation and location, the Turkish people were thus found difficult of approach. In 1927, only 685,040 persons, or one in twenty, could read and write. To form and secure a national state, to inject a synthetic national culture into a people 95 per cent illiterate seemed an overwhelming task.

BUDDHIST RELICS FROM MIRPUR KHAS.

The fourth anniversary of the great temple Mulagandhakuti Vihar, at Sarnath near Benares, was celebrated on the 10th November in the presence of a large gathering of Buddhists and non-Buddhists. About four hundred Buddhist pilgrims from Japan, China, Germany, Czechoslovakia, Burma, Siam, Chittagong and Ceylon had arrived at Benares to participate in this annual celebration lasting for three days. On behalf of the Government of India Mr. J. F. Blakiston, Director General of Archaeology, presented to the Mahabodhi Society Buddhist relics found at Mirpur Khas in Sindh. This function was followed by a Buddhist procession when the presented relics were taken from the museum to Mulagandhakuti Vihar for enshrinement.

The following address was delivered by Mr. J. F. Blakiston, Director-General of Archaeology in India, on the occasion:

"It gives me great pleasure to present to you on behalf of the Government of India the sacred relics found at Mirpur Khas in Sind in 1910 by the late Mr. H. Cousins of the Archaeological Department. On two previous occasions relics from two other sites in different provinces, namely, Taxila in the Punjab and Nagarjunikonda in the Madras Presidency, were presented to you by Government through my predecessor for enshrining at the Mulagandhakuti Vihara at Sarnath. As you are all aware, the spread of the Buddhist faith from the land of its birth has been phenomenal. During the millenium that followed the Master's death, it became the predominant faith almost throughout India and had already reached the distant regions of Ceylon, Tibet, Siam, China, Japan, Mongolia, Afghanistan and Central Asia. In most of the regions the light of Buddhism continues to shine since it was introduced, but in India itself interest in Buddhism has ebbed, and the work of following up the path of the development of this faith in various parts of the country has fallen to the Archaeological Survey of India since the latter part of the 19th century. The Survey can lay claim to having restored, to some extent, the ancient fame of places like Sarnath and Bodhi Gaya, Sravasti and Kasia, Sanchi and Bharhut, Nalanda and Pahrpur, Taxila and Peshawar, Amaravati and Nagarjunikonda. Some of the relics discovered during the earlier explorations being claimed by Burma and Ceylon, countries closely associated with India, in which Buddhism is still the dominant faith, were presented to the Mahabodhi Society by the Government of India. With the renewal of interest in Buddhism in India, thanks to the activities of Societies like the Mahabodhi Society, it is but natural that the relics of the Master and the Great Teachers, who followed him, so dear to the faith and so reverentially consecrated in the centuries of its rise, should be preserved in India itself, and particularly be reassembled at the Holy Centre where the doctrine first saw the light of the day. If the first relic that was presented at the inauguration of the Vihara in 1931 illustrated the spread of the Dharma in the Gandhara country, the second one offered at the first anniversary betokened its prosperity in the lower basin of the Krishna river. The relics which I have the honour to present to you to-day emanate from a site in the lower Indus Valley where the influence of Buddhism was equally prevalent. In the history of the province of Sind, the glorious civilisation of the pre-historic epoch of the 3rd millennium B. C. recently brought to light by the Survey and the flourishing period in the first few centuries of the Christian Era, when Buddhism was the dominant faith, are the only landmarks (prior to the Muhammadan conquest) of which this province can boast.

In February 1910 the late Mr. Henry Cousins, then Superintendent of the Archaeological Survey in the Western Circle, excavated a Buddhist site locally known as Kanhujo-daro, about half a mile to the north of the town of Mirpur Khas, the headquarters of the Thar and Parkar District in Sind and brought to light the remains of a Stupa with a brick basement. Digging down about 25 feet below the summit of the mound exactly in the centre, Mr. Cousins came upon the brick-built relic chamber of this Stupa, in which he discovered the circular stones about a foot across, placed one upon the other forming a coffer with a cavity of about 3 inches in diameter and 4 inches in height in the middle of it. Within this cavity he found a small crystal bottle, while around it and on the top of the stone coffer were sprinkled a number of offerings consisting of crystal, coral and gold beads, small seed pearls, copper coins and other objects. The bottle contained a small cylindrical case of silver with a slip-on lid wrapped round with gold leaf, which was as fresh and bright as the day it was put on. Inside the silver case was a tiny case of gold containing a very minute substance about the size of a pin-head with some dust. Underneath the two metal cases, but within the crystal bottle, was found a small spoonful of brown funeral ashes, some lumps of which had the texture and surface of charred bone. In two of the corners of the relic chamber little narrow-mouthed vases filled with sand were found. The care with which the relics had been deposited left no doubt as to the sanctity in which they were held by builders of the Stupa.

The outer casing of this Stupa at Mirpur Khas with its brick ornamentation cannot be far removed in date from the Dhanekh Stupa here at Sarnath and Mr. Cousins even thought that it was earlier than four hundred A. D. However that may be, there can be no doubt that the Stupa, as it stands with the large monastic establishment, which grew around it and existed up to the 7th century A. D., was built on the site of a ruined Stupa of much earlier date to which the relic deposit must be related. The large sized bricks of the relic chamber, the vases around the relic coffer, and, above all, the copper coins of contemporary date, which are remarkably like the punch-marked coins of Northern India, point to the conclusion that the relics were consecrated in the earlier centuries before the Christian Era. It would not be stretching the existing evidence too far to suppose that the great Mauryan Emperor Asoka was responsible for the construction of this Stupa and that the relic in all probability was a body relic of the Buddha himself and the funeral ashes perhaps those of Upagupta, the famous religious preceptor, who was especially instrumental in spreading the doctrine among the people of Sind.

Until therefore, any better identification is in the field, it may be tentatively accepted that the relics found at Mirpur Khas are those of the Great Founder of this Buddhist faith and the Arhat-Upagupta. Reverend Sir, I have now great pleasure in presenting the relics on behalf of His Excellency.

CATHOLICS AND THE ITALIAN-ETHIOPIAN WAR.*

(BY F. L. BURKE.)

One of the most distressing aspects of the totalitarian State, where the spiritual has not altogether been outlawed, is the suffocation of Christian principles under the all-embracing, overpowering blanket of nationalistic self-interest. The prime example of this today is Italy, a pitiful specimen of a country 99 percent Catholic, where in spite of its glorious theologians, in spite of its being the seat of the Holy Father himself who has been preaching and praying for a Christian peace during the Holy Year just passed, there is now being inaugurated a war clearly immoral when judged by Catholic ethics.

According to Catholic teaching a just war is waged only when it

1. Is undertaken in vindication of a strict right. Italy has no legal right to Ethiopia or any part thereof. "A war is not morally justified which aims at expanding national territory, at seizing even the surplus and undeveloped territory of another, or at compelling a backward nation to develop its natural resources for its own and for other nations' prosperity, no matter how desirable, beneficial or necessary these may be for a developing state." Quoted from 'The Ethics of War (C. A. I. P.)'

2. Is in defense of a right proportionate in magnitude to the damages inflicted by war. In the opinion of many theologians this item alone renders any modern war with its horrible instruments of destruction immoral.

3. Engaged in as a last resort. Italy has insisted on war with Ethiopia and has scorned peaceful settlement except on the basis of Ethiopia's complete surrender to Il Duce. Arbitration has been indignantly rejected by Italy.

4. Will in all probability be victorious. Italy O. K. on this point!

5. Is initiated by public authority. Il Duce is the one and only authority in Italy.

6. Is conducted with a right intention. Whether Italy's intentions in Ethiopia are purely cultural and civilizing or whether they are but lust for power, God only knows—the rest of us can merely guess.

7. Is rightly conducted. A modern war rightly conducted with regard to observance of international agreements, the spread of malicious propaganda, violence to non-combatants, etc., is inconceivable.

The Catholic Association for International Peace has called for economic measures against Italy as an aggressor nation. Emphasizing that Ethiopia "has made every possible effort to obtain a peaceful solution, while Italy has spoken in terms of conquest and has tried to frustrate the collective opinion of the community of nations," the Association advocated economic sanction against Italy by the United States for violation of the Kellogg Pact.

NOTES

Professor Wadia on Parsi Problems:—We publish today excerpts from a paper written by Professor P. A. Wadia on the Parsis of Bombay and their charities. The Professor has been labouring for many years to bring about a co-ordination of the numerous Parsi charitable endowments. That accounts for his taking the administration of charities as the text for his thesis which covers much larger ground, and has an interest for all communities. The Parsi problem, as Professor Wadia clearly perceives, is a part of the Indian problem though, owing to the small and localised population, it presents itself, and is capable of being dealt with, under what may be called "laboratory" conditions. It affords an extremely rare opportunity for sociological investigators. The Parsi community is an integral part of the Indian population and, at the same time, it is a distinct and separate community preserved as such for several centuries by the Indian policy of respect for all faiths. The most striking feature of Professor Wadia's paper, is his clear grasp of the fact that the tendency of the western competitive system to displace the old co-operative system—typified by the Indian joint family—by its greater inroad on Parsi life, has contributed to the acuteness of their problem as compared with other communities which have been slower to adapt themselves to it. Incidentally, it provides an unexpected confirmation of the objection to the early abolition by law of the joint family system by the reformed Legislatures. The abolition of the joint family unless preceded or at least accompanied by the provision of social services such as health insurance and old age pensions by the State, will lead to great distress and discontent.

Relief and Reform:—The disintegration of the joint family among Parsis has progressively increased the number of individuals and families on charity relief as the figures quoted by Professor Wadia testify. He, in fact, fears that the increase is bound to be accelerated at a rate with which the charity funds, large as they are, will find it difficult to cope. What is the remedy? We can think of none which would enable Parsis alone to prosper while the rest of the population remained where it is or declined to a lower level. This Professor Wadia recognises. The better utilisation of the charity funds, which he suggests, is not, as he is careful to explain, a permanent solution. In economic thought the word "charity" has become odious. It is being asserted with increasing insistence that charity is no remedy for poverty. Canon Hudson in his "Preface to a Christian Sociology" observes: "What we have to recognise is that the time for the Church to play second fiddle to my Lady Bountiful is past. 'Damn your charity: we want justice,' is the retort it is apt to provoke. There is a vast difference between a Church which acquiesces in conditions which it recognises as evil, even while it bends its energies towards making life less intolerable for those who suffer under them, and a Church which insists that the conditions shall be changed." Professor Wadia points out that the chief obstacles in the way of a co-ordinated administration of charities are the wealthy men of the community who control the chief endowments and "who have an outlook very much like the outlook of Western aristocrats a hundred years ago." This is rather unjust to the aristocrat. Every aristocracy holds some values as being higher than money values.

Mrs. Sanger in India:—We welcome to India Mrs. Margaret Sanger, pioneer of the Birth Control Movement and one of the foremost women of the United States. Mrs. Sanger arrived in Bombay on Monday and addressed a public meeting the day after. She is guest of honour and principal speaker at the All India Women's Conference which meets in December at Travancore. The Bombay meeting was to have been presided over by the Mayor, but Mr. K. F. Nariman who is punctilious in keeping his public engagements, was detained at a Corporation meeting and Dr. Sokhey of the Haffkine Institute took his place. Dr. Sokhey's name has been associated with a recent controversy on marriage in which he expressed unorthodox opinions. The Birth Control leader has enough prejudices to contend with, without complicating her task by even a semblance of linking it to other propaganda. Mr. Nariman's absence was the first mishap that befell Mrs. Sanger on her Indian visit. There were others but they were of her own making. Social workers here had expected that this experienced leader would have taken an early opportunity to extricate the Birth Control Movement from the many entanglements which its well-meaning but over-zealous advocates had thrust it into. Mrs. Howe-Martyn the English "expert," in a letter to a contemporary a day after Mrs. Sanger's arrival, had encouraged this hope in one important point—namely, the assumption that Birth Control was necessary to prevent over-population. "In the two great birth control countries, England and the U. S. A.," she wrote, "the birth rate has fallen but the numbers of the population have steadily increased. England began to practise birth control seriously in 1876. Every year since then she has had an increase of population at home as well as losing large numbers of people to America, Australia, South Africa." Probably considerations of space prevented her from referring to Russia, where, according to Fannina Halle, propaganda and legislation in favour of Birth Control has resulted in sending up the birth-rate. Mrs. Howe-Martyn is now on her second visit and has modified her earlier attitude.

Doctors and Birth Control:—Mrs. Sanger unfortunately stressed in her speech on Tuesday that the movement aimed at relieving the pressure of population on means of subsistence which is by no means established. It was very regrettable that in her first public utterance in this country she should have sought to confuse birth control and sterilisation. The line of demarcation between the two, as we have said time and again, is clear-cut. Before Mrs. Sanger can include sterilisation under birth control at the one end, she has to extend it at the other to include continence. Why American workers include sterilisation under birth control is largely because there is a law in the States against the former. It is tactics to combat prejudice. Here the necessity does not arise and it will be unwise to follow American methods blindly. We are surprised that Dr. Erulkar who objected in his vote of thanks to continence being included as a birth control method, silently accepted sterilisation as one. Dr. Erulkar assuming special privilege and knowledge as a doctor, declared pontifically that continence in the normal person was not only impossible but positively undesirable. No 'normal person' would dream of seeking medical opinion on this matter of common sense, and Dr. Miss Mistri seconding Dr. Erulkar's vote expressed Indian opinion in protesting against his depreciation of self-control. Dr. Mistri further expressed her opinion that advice on birth control should be given to married women only, on medical grounds alone and by qualified doctors exclusively. It is doubtful whether this can be put into practical effect but she has done well in attempting to strip birth control of all the extravagant claims of its exponents and in presenting it as a measure of relief for suffering women.

The Viceroy and the Byculla Club:—Sir Chimanlal Setalvad's open letter to Lord Willingdon, requesting His Excellency not to accept the invitation to a farewell dinner at the Byculla Club when he comes to Bombay in April next, has fallen flat and has even been the subject of ironical comment in some Indian newspapers. This is because the letter did not make it clear that what Sir Chimanlal objected to, was not the Viceroy's dining at an exclusive European Club but to giving it importance by making it the occasion of a pronouncement on political and public affairs as has been the custom hitherto. Even if the Club relax for this occasion its rule against the admission of Indians as guests, the objection will remain. If the Viceroy feels that he can not leave the country, which has been off and on his sphere of activity for about eighteen years, without making a speech, it should not be difficult to make it in less invidious surroundings. The Municipal Corporation or the Bombay University, may like to offer Lord and Lady Willingdon, as old friends, its hospitality even though a formal address or an honorary degree may not be deemed expedient in view of his political record on which Sir Chimanlal has gone out of his way to congratulate His Excellency. Lord Willingdon was led to adopt a policy of 'thorough' in dealing with the civil disobedience movement by the confidence, which he expressed more than once, that he will inaugurate constitutional government in India before he laid down his office. That hope has not been fulfilled. The disappointment to His Excellency is no doubt as great as it has been to the country, and Sir Chimanlal's tribute may go unappreciated. The club which bears Lord Willingdon's name may also be approached to provide a platform for His Excellency's farewell to India, which, in any case, is sure to be broadcast.

Oliver Baldwin:—The Indian cinema industry has rendered valuable service to the Anglo-Indian community by opening out a new career to its women who were among the first to take to the screen. This naturally involved their adopting Indian dress and customs and several of the stars have felt it necessary to assume Indian names. As most of them were not able to endure the strain of living European lives and acting Indian, Indianisation was carried into their homes. Their comparatively large salaries increased to some extent the number of dependants. A section of the community which had long lived in isolation amid Indians, was now drawn to them. The advent of the talkies accelerated the process. According to "Reynold's Weekly", Indian cinemas have made a further contribution to Indianising members of other communities.

Mr. Oliver Baldwin, Socialist son of the British Premier and author of a book on Jesus which was notable for its unorthodox estimate of Judas, will adopt Indian clothing and village life when he arrives in Bengal for achieving local colour for a film scenario. Mr. Lester Hutchinson has narrated in his book on Meerut how he came to India as a journalist but that a series of unforeseen accidents, including the financial instability of his prospective employer, threw him into Meerut Jail as an accused in the communist conspiracy case. Unlike Mr. Hutchinson, Mr. Baldwin has made up his mind on political questions and it is most unlikely that he will drift into any movement as casually as that individual did. Moreover the Communist bogey is at rest for the present but one can never tell when it may be raised again. We trust that Mr. Baldwin will have a happy visit.

Social Workers' Failure:—Instances are not unknown of people, who have been eminently successful as social workers, developing unexpected traits when invested with authority. The phenomenon has been repeated on a large scale in the United States where social workers were drafted to administer the enormous system of State relief to 20 million unemployed. The New Republic (October 13) publishes a contributed article headed "Spying on the Jobless," and in its editorial comments thereon, observes: "It is easy to understand the irritation of the social workers who, in the main, are in charge of relief in Washington and in the various States and cities. Few of these men and women have ever had any experience in labour relations; most of them, before the depression, had worked all their lives on salaries for private or public groups caring for individual 'clients,' who were pathetically grateful for anything done for them. But today, the twenty million persons on relief include many of a different calibre—people who were successful in their own fields a few years ago, people who are conscious of no personal failure but quite correctly attribute their plight to the inadequacies of a wretched, makeshift social system. The social workers, in their great test, have, on the whole, proved bad executives, unimaginative and unsympathetic, too quick to fall back upon the easy solution of charging that the unemployed are seeking to overturn the government, too hasty in threatening a recalcitrant with the danger of starvation for himself and his friends."

Slums and Their Owners:—Mr. K. F. Nariman's active interest in the work of improving the city, and particularly the slums of Bombay, during his term of office as Mayor, is bearing fruit. Mr. I. H. Taunton, Municipal Commissioner, spoke mainly on the question of eradicating the slums in his address on "Some Aspects of Municipal Work" at Tuesday's Rotary Club meeting. Mr. Taunton remarked in the course of speech, "The north and east of the island (of Bombay) have large colonies of corrugated tin sheds which are no better than hovels, and the people inhabiting them are living in squalor. You will be surprised to learn that these sheds are owned by some of our wealthy, even prominent, citizens." A society which looks on labour agitation with marked suspicion as likely to develop Communist tendencies, ought surely to compel more responsible conduct from capitalists. Mr. Taunton declared that the direct removal of slums was not practicable even for a wealthy local body like the Bombay Municipal Corporation. But it would be hardly fair to the middle-class citizen to tax him for providing better conditions for workers employed by the mills. It is the responsibility of the employer who reaps profits from their labour, to provide his men with proper living conditions, and the establishment of a standard in this matter and its rigid enforcement would be a first step toward solving the problem. After all one cannot expect people to live decently in "hovels" and the Commissioner's inveighing against the habits of the people seems to be a trifle irresponsible. As the chief executive of a large corporation Mr. Taunton can only ask the people to maintain a certain standard when he has done his best for them and on his own admission he has not come any where near doing so. The interest of our well-to-do Rotarians in the conditions in which a number of their fellow-citizens live is indicative of the contagious nature of Mr. Nariman's enthusiasm. The discussion of such a subject would hardly have been considered suitable for a lunch.

Memory of Past Birth:—Some years ago a young boy in Northern India gave details of his life in a previous birth in a nearby village, which were verified and found true by enquirers. Within the last few days a sensation has been created by an eight years old girl in Delhi declaring herself to have been the wife of a citizen of Muttra and to have died in giving birth to a son by him. We publish an account of the case. The latest news is that the girl was taken to Muttra by a committee of Delhi citizens and that she identified her former father-in-law and other relatives, fondled the ten years old son of whom she claimed to be the mother, mentioned a confidential talk with her husband in the former birth, which was known only to him and her. The doctrine of rebirth is universal among Hindus. The Bhagavad Gita asserts that the soul does not leave a body before finding for itself another. Other authorities postulate an interval, long or short, according to the deserts of each individual between two births. The Delhi case, like the previous case of the boy, would seem to show that the Gita doctrine is the right one. What distinguishes it from the generality of cases is that, while in the latter, memory of former life survives only as impulse, in the Delhi case it has continued as memory. The girl wishes to resume her previous life with her former husband who has another wife, whom she is unable to recognise.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

BOMBAY, November 30, 1935.

SIR T. SAPRU ON EDUCATION.

One of the praiseworthy characteristics of an earlier generation of educated Indians, who had risen to positions of influence in official or public life, was the great interest they took in students and their activities. Like other old traditions this also is rather tending to fall into disuse. To this tendency, Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru is the most outstanding exception at the present day. His interest in students is warm and generous. It is impossible not to be struck by the earnestness and eloquence of the pronouncement on the educational problem which he made at the second University Students' Conference over which he presided last week at Allahabad. The educated youth of India, and not of the United Provinces only, is eager to know how, with much the same education as they have received, with the same opportunities or lack of them and, we believe, not much more of initial worldly advantages than many others started with, he has risen to the position which he has come to occupy in official no less than in public estimation. He has as little of the arts of the courtier as of the demagogue. He is not smooth-tongued and is even apt to be impulsive in speech when he is strongly moved. He broke away from his old Liberal Party, unable to stand their run-with-the-hare and hunt-with-the-hound politics. He told British statesmen at the Joint Parliamentary Committee, when Lord Halifax tried to wriggle out of his pronouncement when Viceroy of India about Dominion Status being the goal of constitutional reform, that, if at that stage, they were telling him that such a promise was not made, he for one would have nothing more to do with the reforms. True to his word he has since publicly announced with reference to some reports that he will not seek or accept any position under the reform scheme. True, he has somewhat puzzled his countrymen by advising them to work the reforms for all they are worth, notwithstanding that his own position clearly shows that in his opinion they are not worth much. This can be explained by assuming that Sir Tej is not sure that the strength of character which is happily his, is sufficiently diffused among his countrymen as yet and that he can not take the responsibility of inviting them to follow his example. His views on Indian education are tinged with the same diffidence. A young man who heard Sir Tej's speech at the Allahabad Conference or one who reads it in the papers, may ask himself: "If Sir Tej, in spite of the serious defects of our system, has managed to attain the success and eminence in professional and public life that he has, why should it prove so disastrous to me as he, in his solicitude, assures us it will, unless it is radically changed?" He may even think, "I shall be content with a small part of the success which has come to him. Why does he frighten me, at the threshold of my career, when I expect words of encouragement from an elder so justly esteemed, by referring to M. A.'s who sell milk in the streets and L.L. B's who have to go from door to door in search of a client or a job?" We must say that we feel considerable sympathy for the young man. To tell young men that their education, the only one within their reach, is worthless, and that the prospect before them is as gloomy as it can be, is hardly fair to them. We take upon ourselves, therefore, to advise young men who heard or read Sir Tej's speech to think more of his example than of his opinion of the value of the education which they have received or may be receiving.

There are a few questions which we feel impelled to ask on some of the issues dealt with by the distinguished speaker. Is it possible to deal with unemployment among the educated classes apart from that of the chronic unemployment among the uneducated masses in the country? At a time when the economic interdependence of nations and continents are being forcibly brought home to all, can we really divide the problem in this country into separate parts and seek a solution for one without reference to the conditions affecting the other and greater part of it? Is there really proportionately more unemployment among the educated than among the manual workers who form the bulk of the population? Is there really a hard and fast line between the cultural and practical life, between reality and theory, such as was postulated in the address? How are we to account for the 20 millions of unemployed in the United States where babies play with mechanized toys and the mechanical bent persists right up to every stage of education? Or for the two millions in Britain despite the team spirit, character and faculty of quick decision which it is said to be the chief aim of British education to foster? India is the only country where unemployment is proclaimed to be the result of education. Sir Tej said that during his recent tour in Europe he found that the general tendency was to give a 'practical' turn to education. But surely they are not trying to solve unemployment by that means. Economic sufficiency for every nation, whether it is wise or unwise, is the one policy which all nations have turned to as the remedy for unemployment. We are not able to do that here but it is no reason why we should make a scapegoat of education which, within three quarters of a century, has produced proportionately a larger number and a finer type of national leaders than countries far more advantageously situated in every respect, not the least among them being Sir Tej himself. You may make education as practical as you please, you may convert all our schools and colleges into technical and technological institutions, but you will not reduce unemployment in the least unless you are able to raise the purchasing power of the people and to prevent its being drained away from the country. To have one's feet on the ground, is no great achievement. Most of us cannot help it. But the human spirit has not been content to stick in the mud and has taught itself to fly at much sacrifice of life and energy. Cecil Rhodes on his first visit to Africa was fording a turbulent stream on horseback in company with a big-game hunter in that part of the world. The swift eddies of the river round his horse's legs made him faint. His companion noticing it gave a sharp rap on his chin, "Look up, man, not down." We shall only get faint by looking down and fixing our eyes on the vicious circle of our personal and particular problems. Our educational system is far from perfect, to be sure. It demands rectification in several ways some of which we expect to find in the forthcoming report of the Sapru Committee on unemployment among educated men in the United Provinces. In another direction, too, it will need to be brought into line with contemporary requirements. A British educationist, Head Master of Dartington Hall, in his "Education in a Changing World" calls attention to a need of the time. We take the following from the review of the book in the New Republic: "Mr. Curry points out that, in the face of the present growth of political and social dictatorships, parents have the right to ask themselves whether they wish to educate their children in a way which leaves a strong chance that their lives will be spent in prison or worse. But he makes an eloquent case for the fact that if all parents answer, no, there is apparently no hope at present for social or individual progress for freedom of the spirit or for moral or personal integrity."

Trade in Girls:—The energetic Vigilance Association Worker, Mr. P. G. Naik, writes: "Another girl who was shown to me was an orphan and was brought to Bombay from Ratlam by a gang consisting of men and women. Some members of the gang had secured the possession of the girl and the others had served the financial help to bring her to Bombay. On their arrival in Bombay they stayed in a Dharmashala for a week, during which time they got in touch with accused No. 1 who was the local agent, arranging to get such girls disposed of in Bombay. He had rented a room for them and had also arranged for their maintenance. If independently approached the gang was prepared to accept Rs. 3,000/- for the girl, while the Bombay agent would demand at least Rs. 5,000/-. Both the gang and the Bombay agent had no hesitation in selling the girl to any person without any distinction of caste, creed or religion. Unfortunately, the gang got scent of the arrest and disappeared altogether from the place.... The most difficult part of the investigation in such cases, is to ascertain the age of the girl; as, if the girl is above 18 years, no legal action is possible. It is very difficult to tell the age of a girl simply from her general appearance and it is not possible to get any other evidence about her age at this stage of investigation."

GENERAL RIGBY IN ZANZIBAR.

"General Rigby, Zanzibar and the Slave Trade" by Mrs. Charles E. B. Russell (George Allen and Unwin, London; price 16 sh.) is primarily a record of the services of her father in combatting the traffic in African slaves when he was British Consul in Zanzibar, 1858-61. Mrs. Russell feels that her father's contribution to the abolition of Negro slavery, has met with little recognition and the book is a posthumous discharge of a filial duty and as such is entitled to appreciation. The General during his three years of office liberated 8,000 slaves a large proportion of whom was owned by Indians in violation of the law making the holding of slaves a crime in the British Empire. General Rigby took the view that British Indian subjects who were not allowed to own slaves in their country, were subject to the same restraint in Zanzibar although it was foreign territory. Many of the Indians in the Island were, however, subjects of Cutch and they sought the protection of the Sultan against the British Consul, and their claim to be exempt from his jurisdiction was upheld by the Bombay Government which was then in control of Indian interests there. As the Cutchies had relatives among Indians from British India, it was easy for the latter to plead that they were not the owners but that the slaves belonged to a near or distant relative who was a subject of Cutch. It was estimated that 25,000 negro slaves had been sent to Kathiawar and Cutch about the time General Rigby was Consul. The General's methods were short and summary. He issued a proclamation one day calling on all British subjects who owned slaves to bring them all to be emancipated within the period of one month from the date of the order. "During the month," writes Mrs. Russell, "not a single British subject complied with the instructions to bring slaves to the Consulate. On the day before the expiration of this term, the Consul summoned one of the wealthiest Hindus, whom he knew to be possessed of over four hundred slaves. He presented himself at the Consulate in very scanty attire, the upper part of his fat body entirely nude. Rigby at once summarily fined him a hundred dollars for disrespect to Her Majesty, and enforced immediate payment. He then asked him why he had neglected to comply with his proclamation to produce all his slaves for the purpose of being emancipated. He replied that his slaves were his own private property, purchased with his own money, and he denied the Consul's authority to deprive him of them. Thereupon Rigby sent for a blacksmith, and ordered him to fasten on the Baniar's legs the heaviest pair of irons he could procure." There was a hartal but Rigby was inflexible and the Baniar sent word that he was willing to obey the orders of the Consul. He was released and ordered to pay twenty dollars to each of his four hundred slaves who were set free on the spot, as compensation as he had illegally held them in slavery. The Hindu refused this exaction and was sent back to jail, kept there until he consented to pay. The queer thing was that the French, American and other foreigners were all the time carrying on a considerable trade in slaves and Rigby's protests made no impression on them. The Bombay Government in pursuance of the policy of supporting the man on the spot approved of Rigby's action but when he left and his successor reverted to the laissez faire policy of his predecessors, that Government approved of it also.

"The truth was that the wave of humanitarian zeal which swept over Britain in the end of the eighteenth century had spent itself out. The emancipation of slaves in 1833 was its culmination. Darwin's "Origin of the Species", with its slogan

'survival of the fittest' was published in 1859. In the American Civil War, British sympathy was with the slave States. The system of free emigres devised by the French to take the place of slavery, which British statesmen had denounced as thinly-veiled slavery, was taken over and adopted under the name of "indentured labour" and thousands of natives of India found their way to the British Colonies right up to 1912 when it was abolished by the persistency of Gokhale. Slavery itself was not completely extinguished in the British Colonies till 1927. Rigby had left England at the age of 16, when the anti-slavery sentiment was still warm in British hearts. There was also a personal sub-conscious feeling behind his intense hatred of slavery. His home life was most unhappy. "I was born at Yateley Lodge, Hants, on the 18th of January 1820," he writes, "and, according to the custom of those days, I was put out to nurse in a cottage, until I was two years old. This horrid and unnatural custom of separating young children from the parents, of course, went far to destroy natural affection on both sides. All I remember of my early childhood is the harshness and neglect with which I was treated. My father was affectionate and fond of his children; my mother never cared for them in the slightest, and she always evinced an especial dislike to me. I never remember during my whole childhood the slightest caress or affection from her. I, therefore, grew up with a fear and dread of her, and always ran away and hid when I saw her approaching. At this time my father had chambers in the Inner Temple and usually remained all the week in London, returning home by the coach on Saturday. I always dreaded his return, knowing the beating in store for me. His first visit was always to the nursery, armed with a stick or cane, and in reply to his question if the children had been good, the nurse's reply was, "yes all very good except master Christopher." Knowing what would follow, I used to pile all the chairs and furniture in one corner and creep under them to get out of the way of the cane." Young Rigby at seven years of age was packed off to a school at Brough in Westmoreland, where his experience was even worse than in his unhappy home. The food was bad and poor, the boys had to sleep three in a bed "and there being insufficient room, the smallest boy was kicked out and stood shivering on the cold floor, not daring to creep into bed again until certain, the other two boys were fast asleep. Each morning the master went round the boys' bedrooms with a birch rod, and severely flogged the boys who had wetted their beds." Letters were allowed only twice a year, and the boys were obliged to say that they were very happy and did not want to go home. If a boy managed to post a letter without being seen by the master, the village postmaster was sure to send it to the latter and the boy was cruelly flogged as a warning to others. After three years in this establishment without a single visit to his home, young Rigby managed to write a letter to his father (with a mixture of soot and water for ink and hiding in a hayloft) telling him how miserable he was and begging to be taken away. He was sent to a school at Abingdon and while there his father wrote to him offering to procure him a cadetship to India, giving him two days to decide whether to accept or refuse it. The very next day he replied accepting the offer. "I think," writes Mrs. Russell in a footnote, "there is little doubt that it is his sufferings at this school (Brough) which later inspired Rigby with a depth of pity alien to his age for the sufferings of slaves, particularly a child slave. He knew."

That Rigby's efforts to emancipate slaves was prompted not by general considerations of the brotherhood of man, is shown by his remarks on his return to Bombay in 1864 as Boundary Commissioner in Kathiawar. He writes in a letter to a friend,—"You can't imagine what a change has come over Bombay; it is dirtier and more stinking than it ever was, cholera and smallpox are always raging, there is no sign of any material improvement, not a decent building erected anywhere. The natives are wallowing in wealth, which they do not know what to do with; they occupy all the finest houses, drive fine carriages with servants in grand liveries, and quite out the Europeans in everything. They no longer show the slightest respect to Europeans, and the present system is to flatter and pamper these greasy, fat Banians, call them all Esquires, make them Justices of the Peace and Fellows of the University. Fancy the people voting a statue to that fellow A—who was known to be in correspondence with the mutineers in '57. And Mr. B— of the Bombay Times, for always trumpeting the virtues of the natives, has got from them a subscription of a lac of rupees! He came out as an agent for C—, the wine-merchant, was dismissed, then set up as a merchant, became bankrupt, then Sub-Editor under old B—. The Bombay Railway appears to be completely disorganised. Instead of assisting to develop the trade of the interior, they have lately issued a notice that they won't receive cotton for carriage to Bombay. There is an immense amount of gambling in Bombay in all sorts of bubble companies, and I fancy there'll be a great smash some day. Almost every merchant seems to get up a Bank or a Shipping Company. As long as cotton keeps so dear, I suppose things will go on smoothly, but the crisis must come some day. The Jews are now the rising people in Bombay and have the finest houses." The prophecy came true. An interesting chapter in Mrs. Russell's book is that describing the episode in which her father came into sharp conflict with Richard Burton, translator of the Arabian Nights who went on an exploratory expedition to the interior of Africa, when Rigby was consul in Zanzibar.

THE PARSIS OF BOMBAY AND PARSİ CHARITIES.

(BY P. A. WADIA.)

Nowhere does the contrast between the East and the West in the social and economic spheres present such fruitful material for observation and study as in the small community of Parsis living in Bombay. We have here a community with substantial resources in the shape of charitable endowments of all kinds, whose members have very rapidly taken to an indiscriminate imitation of Western manners and modes of life, and many of the upper classes of which have an outlook very much like the outlook of Western aristocrats a hundred years ago. Whilst modern capitalism in the West pays a lip worship at any rate to the new tendencies of our times, when the disinherited classes are seeking to come into their own, the representatives of capital in this community who are mainly responsible for the administration of the charitable endowments placed in their hands, resort to a system of outdoor relief such as prevailed in England under the Poor Law Administration in the days of Malthus. The anxiety and the alarm which Malthus felt in his days, the well-wishers of the Parsi community feel today, as an indiscriminate system of doles undermining the morale of the community seems to be at work on an increasing scale, adding from year to year to the number of those who are dependent on communal relief. If there existed any opportunity for a capitalist society to proclaim to the disillusioned world its ability to organise a social order embodying the principles of justice, and securing contented classes co-operating with one another on a basis of healthy and comfortable living, by wise planning of the resources at its command, such an opportunity seems to exist today in the Parsi community. There is nothing more tragic than the wastage of the resources at the disposal of the community and the neglect of the opportunities which such resources afford for wise and intelligent planning for the future welfare of the community.

The number of Parsis living today in the city of Bombay is 55,000. Till 1921 the number of the community remained fairly steady over a period of 30 to 40 years. But the community increased by 5,500 souls in the decade ending 1921. It is difficult to make any statement with regard to the distribution of income, and changes in this distribution of income during the last 50 years in the community. But one or two observations may be safely made on the subject. In the first 75 years of the last century our community made rapid strides in its economic status and development, and consequently played a prominent part in the social and political life of the country. We were the first of the Indian communities to take advantage of the opportunities which contact with the British people opened out to the country. We acted as intermediaries between the East India Company's employees and the Indians. We availed ourselves more readily than others of the educational facilities which were offered to us in missionary institutions and in the Government Schools and Colleges. Our adventurous and enterprising spirits ventured across the seas as traders and merchants in the further East, at a time when crossing the Blackwater would have involved living death to the Hindus. By our educational attainments in the earlier days we were able to occupy leading positions in the public services and the front rank in medicine, law and other professions. It has also to be remembered that in those earlier days our ways of living were simple, the cost of living was not so high, and our communal needs were few and could be easily satisfied by the resources at our disposal.

Our general education and our enterprise enabled us to lead fairly comfortable lives as merchants and tradesmen, as employees in Government services and in private firms, and members of the professions. The joint family organisation which we shared in common with the other Indian communities enabled us to take care of our dependants, and the funds at the disposal of the Parsi Panchayat Trustees were sufficient to provide for the needs of those whom adversity left stranded and helpless. Whilst our affluence in those days of simple living enabled us to provide for the needs of our own dependants, it also made possible the flow of charity far beyond the limits of our community, in grateful memories of the days when the country had given a kindly and hospitable shelter.

Very rapid changes have taken place, however, in the social and economic condition of the Parsis living in Bombay City during the last quarter of a century. The rapid rise in the cost of living has seriously affected our community. Whilst prices have gone up, the average earnings of large numbers of the community have not correspondingly increased. As a rule wages do not rise in exact correspondence with the rise in prices. But in our case there were further factors that were responsible for bringing about a serious situation. Numbers of our community have definitely abandoned the simpler modes of life to which they were once accustomed. There are some who regard the standard of comfort to which the Parsis have grown accustomed as an artificially high standard which is bound to affect unfavourably the general condition of the community. Our community has to recognise sooner or later the impossibility of maintaining an artificially high standard of living, more especially when we are surrounded by communities whose modes of life are simpler and whose social life is still based on the co-operative principles of the joint family system which we abandoned at a much earlier date. It is also to be remembered that the initial advantage which our community enjoyed in the earlier days of possessing a privileged position in the public services and in private firms as pioneers, and as having taken more rapidly to the educational opportunities which were offered to the country, the community is now gradually losing. In Government employment we no longer enjoy the preference which we once enjoyed due to our general attainments and to our professions of loyalty. In the professions likewise we can no longer hold the prominent position which we once held, when the other communities had not taken to education in such large numbers as they are now doing. There has been moreover between 1881 and 1931 a marked change in the nature of the occupational distribution of the Parsis living in Bombay city. There is a drift from an occupational point of view, from trade and industry to clerical work. It is a truism that a number of textile factories which were hitherto controlled by Parsis and which served to absorb a certain number of the community have now been sold or closed down. The men who have been employed in these factories and others employed in factories belonging to non-Parsis have now been thrown out of work. We estimate the number of families whose earning members have thus been thrown out of employment as between 500 and 1,000.

The prospect before the community in the immediate future seem to be very clouded. With the continuation of the depression, and with the increasing struggle for existence in a city like Bombay where the unskilled members of our community accustomed to an artificially high standard have to face the competition of more skilful men belonging to other communities, we must be prepared to see the number of dependants on charity funds increasing in the years to come. The resources at the disposal of our community will continue to be taxed till they reach the limit. These resources are not inexhaustible. With greater co-ordination they could be economised, and a considerable amount of wastage might be prevented. But at present we are not only reconciled to a policy of wastage of these resources, but we seem to live in the present without taking any thought of the future. The poorer sections who are in receipt of doles are rapidly multiplying. Their children are usually ill-fed, feeble in body and much more feeble in mind. It is exceedingly common to find in these classes half-witted boys and girls, whose education requires special treatment but who have been allowed to vegetate in the lower standards of our educational institutions, till their parents are compelled to remove them only to throw them into the world to drag out an unemployed existence or to earn a miserable pittance supplemented by doles. These social misfits unable to maintain themselves, and with no sense of responsibility in the matter of increasing the size of their family, will become an increasing burden on the community. The boys and girls of these social misfits, when they grow up half-witted and weaklings, will be unable to earn a decent living for themselves, and with the help of doles will multiply the number of dependants in ever expanding circles. This seems to be the prospect facing the community in the future as the result of our present method of administering the charity funds at our disposal.

What are the measures that our community has thought of adopting in the face of these conditions? We have not as yet in our community any trained social workers who could be regular visitors in the slums, advising families about their needs and the needs of their children, and following up from year to year the physical and mental development of these children. We have no facilities in the city for the proper training of such social workers. None of our charities have even dreamt so far of securing the services of trained social workers for meeting some of the needs for work of this kind in our community. The extent of unemployment in our community is further bound to increase on account of the more general causes that are connected with trade depression the whole world over. The adoption of a farsighted policy and planning would require a twofold series of measures; firstly, an organised effort at supplementing the limited income of all classes of unemployed people, the help being graded according to the size of the family, irrespective of all other considerations based upon merit or desert; and secondly, careful planning for the children of such families providing for their health and educational needs. But even when all this is done, we do not think we shall see the end of poverty or unemployment; firstly, because such unemployment is determined by causes which lie beyond the control of our community, and also because the social and economic environment in which the community is living, with differences in standard of comfort, with relative disparity in numbers, and with limited avenues of employment in a country dependent on the mercies of foreign rulers, may frustrate the effects of all the careful planning that our community may resort to. No single community, even though it may be small in numbers and provided with material resources, can today live a separate and isolated existence. Its economic life will be determined by factors beyond its control. And whilst we need not be entirely pessimistic with regard to the future, we must be prepared to face the possibility of a frustration of all our well-devised schemes in a world which is becoming increasingly unified, and where, therefore, we can only prosper together or fail together.

CAN SOCIALISM SAVE THE WORLD?

It is the capacity to think, feel and act that differentiates man from the animal. These are the functions that automatically establish for him a moral relationship with his fellow beings which is absent in the other species of life. And society is nothing but this organised relationship. Animals may move in herds and trees may grow in forests but they cannot build societies among themselves for they lack in this fundamental requisite of intercommunication. These functions again automatically develop in him a personality, creating around him an atmosphere which is congenial to their growth. Apart from his physical needs which are common between the animal and himself, his personality has its own peculiar needs. It is this personality and its spontaneous moral obligations that are capable of creating that organisation called society. For it loves and seeks to serve; it thinks and exchanges thoughts; and it expresses itself in various forms which connote beauty and seeks joy in its surroundings. Love is the oxygen of that 'person' within and love means service. The wish of people to achieve salvation or personal freedom by serving humanity is no idle dream. It has a meaning which those in whom that personality is killed cannot understand. Through service it evolves, perhaps into the infinite. Love must act if at all it exists. It is spiritual. And morality is the gist of all its activities. Both spirituality and morality are but its heart and brain.

History is a conflict between that personality and all complications that arise as a result of the interference of physical needs with its moral activities. Physical needs, commingling with the moral obligations of a person, superseded all other claims and gave an economic colour to the whole of his life. A communistic form of society in which that personality is totally crushed is not a commendable form of socialism but a degenerating form of animalism. It is utilising the human energy to keep the man as a "regimental" animal. To suppress oneself in the interests of a society is not a sacrifice but a suicide. Socialism, in its true sense, is a movement of the society and society being essentially the organic form of all personal relationships among individuals, there cannot exist a form of socialism which does not include the growth of personality. Also there cannot be a growth of personality—to put it conversely—unless that relationship assumes a socialistic form. Society begins with the growth of personality, it is but the objectified form of personal love of one individual for others. It is the moral quintessence of individual loves. There is no society where personality does not act and there cannot be socialism where there is no society. Therefore, any true form of socialism should include that personal growth, growth of individual personality. That form of socialism is nothing but a new form of social order where all individuals possess the freedom to grow.

If you allow a man to live he automatically breathes, you need not teach him about it. If you allow the personality to grow, it automatically grows and loves, you need not force it to do so. But love itself, or acts of love, demand thought, discretion, foresight, wisdom and the assimilation of facts or truth; which in their turn demand free scope for intercommunication. For there cannot be either thought or action in a vacuum. When personality grows self-expression is unavoidable. But self-expression demands harmony, coherent arrangements of facts and a pleasing form of communication. This involves beauty. But all these conduce to the growth of the individual and the freedom of his life.

However imperfect it might be, these forces of intellect, emotion and expression, they must act and while doing so they build among themselves an organisation which is not only a means for their activities but also a means for their own recreation. Through that organisation they give and take. An individual, while offering to the society whatever he is able to give, also receives whatever is possible for him to assimilate. That organisation is the social system. Therefore that social organisation which is merely incidental to human life is pledged with two different but complementary functions. Firstly to convey to the individual the rich achievements of the past thus enabling him to grow higher and secondly to distribute his own personal gifts, with an impartial hand, amongst all the other members of the society. If it cannot fulfil these two functions properly it is imperfect and when it is imperfect the individual is bound to suffer. Man grows as an individual, expands and deepens his private personality by rationally appropriating the social medium in which he lives—by making its meaning his knowledge and converting its higher tendencies and possibilities of better things into his personal purpose. If his growth is stunted, it is because his appropriation is incomplete. In the individual the life of his community would receive a new incarnation. So that individual and society are not separable, as different elements within a whole.

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

Distinction, friction, antagonism come only from their imperfection. The one is not the other only because it is not itself. Society is an external necessity to the individual because he is not sufficiently intelligent to grasp its meaning or sufficiently good to adopt its ends; and society on its part is a mechanical and most imperfect whole only because its members are only partly "rationalised." That social organisation is a moral medium and the individuals can be perfected or they can be rendered perfect happiness only by perfecting that medium. The aim of socialism should be the perfecting of that medium or the reorganising it into perfection. True socialism is not opposed to individual growth, it is not mere "regimentation" as some critics imagine.

It is this ethical relationship that makes the society, an intermingling of three positive forces, intellect, emotion and expression or, to put them in terms of what they connote, truth, love and beauty. Physical relationship cannot make a society. Even marriage cannot, but love can. Family is an expression of love emotion but not animal passion. It is not economic forces that make societies or increase necessities of life. There is no such thing as economic relationship among mankind. It has no life, such a thing cannot exist. Emotion is the cause for the increase of necessities. The so-called luxuries are called luxuries on account of their rarity, nor can they exist unless man has developed a sense of beauty. Hero-worship is the cause of monarchy and dictatorship, while love for freedom is the mother of all rebellions and revolutions. True intellectual force is a selfless search after truth and history testifies the fact that the greatest of intellectual giants died in poverty. Many tried in despair to simplify the emotion for a luxurious life and reduce the economic wastage over them. But such a thing is an impossibility. For all luxuries are really the products of artistic tastes in man. That desire cannot be put out as long as the sportive aesthetic sense is present in every individual. Perhaps that is a means of ventilation for the martial inclinations in him. It is not the 'grapes are sour' philosophy that can save us from this situation of want and despair but complete industrialisation and free supply of commodities to all tastes, avoiding, of course, all possible waste. Therefore even industrialisation is fundamentally an ethical movement. And we see with our own eyes that it is a failure in the hands of the 'amoral' capitalist.

Socialism from all points of view is an ethical movement which aims at reorganising the present social system, which is essentially a moral structure, into a really useful organisation to the growing individual. "The evolution of the individual's powers," writes MacIver, "is hindered by the hard necessities of an imperfectly moralised social system and evolution of the public good is baffled by the narrow views and the unsocialised wills of individuals." Ultimately it is the individual that lives and suffers.

It has become almost a habit with most of the critics of socialism to bring in the affairs of Russia whenever views on socialism are expressed. The intrinsic worth of a movement can neither be judged nor challenged by the success or failure of all experiments conducted in its name. While on the other hand most of the socialists are marking time in conducting small scale experiments in their local political spheres without attempting at a thorough-going reorganisation of the human system as a whole, the touchy communists are marking their time in waiting for a world-catastrophe which might yield an opportunity for their world revolution. The former follow the path of their slow political reformation which would take a very long time before it might reach the individual, mixing up socialism with gradualness, and the latter follow the path of uncompromising dictatorial coercion. But both are political methods of force. One operating gradually, another immediately. Neither of them are following the methods of morally reorganising the system by means of constructive work from the side of the masses themselves. The communist believes that he is coercing the individuals for their own good. This is a very innocent mischief. He either does not know what goodness is or what he is doing. He is ignorant of the fact that nothing good can be expected from a suppressed individual. The fallacy lies in his thought itself, in his very ideology. He imagines that everything is economics, while in reality nothing is economics.

If anything can save the world from these various alarming and conflicting forces, it is a true form of socialism which would moralise the fundamental organic forces on which the whole social structure is based, the forces of intellect, emotion, and expression. Here moralising means socialising. And it can be achieved by organising constructive methods. Intellect which is the origin of all discoveries and organisations, emotion which is the origin of all attachments, and expression which is the means of communication and assimilation—all these three true forces can be reorganised only if all the socialist volunteers of human freedom join together in a constructive international programme. This alone can save the world.

THE LATE G. K. DEVADHAR.

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

With reference to your note that "the conception of politics to which Gokhale sought to give expression through his Society was a comprehensive end," may I add that it was in a great measure due to the late Mr. Devadhar. Thirty years ago, four men sat in a circle on a prominent spot on the low ridge which runs between the Fergusson College and the Society's headquarters. Gokhale first took the seven vows and then administered them successively to Messrs. Dravid, Devadhar and Patwardhan. The first Memorandum of the Association written in the Admission book of the Society in Mr. Gokhale's hand which opens with the words, "We, the undersigned, agree to associate ourselves to form a Society, called the Servants of India Society, and we agree to be bound by the Articles set forth below and the rules and regulations that may be made" defines the objects of the Society to be "to train men for the work of political education and agitation, and to promote by all constitutional means the national interests of the Indian people." Mr. Devadhar whose bent in the direction of organising social service work had been marked even before he joined the Society, insisted upon the change being made without loss of time; and hence the article defining the objects reads thus; "The objects of the Society are to train national missionaries for the service of India, and to promote by all constitutional means the true interests of the Indian people." The scope of the Society was thus widened at the earliest stage into comprehensive service of the people in the missionary spirit; and the members of the Society, especially the Bombay branch under the directions of the Mr. Devadhar, were persistently criticized for allowing social service to engross the greater part of their energy and time. But Mr. Gokhale warmly defended the adoption of this wide definition with enthusiasm during his time.

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Nov. 30

Indeed, Mr. Devadhar's work had been so effectively done that Lord Sydenham asked Mr. Sastri when he appeared before the Joint Select Committee of Parliament in 1919, "Are not you responsible, as Mr. Gokhale's successor, for changing the Servants of India Society, which he had meant exclusively for social service, into a political body?" Mr. Sastri had to remind His Lordship of a political conversation at the time of his visit to the Society, and of his gift of books on political subjects to the Society, to convince him that he was in the wrong about the real objects of the Society. At the present day, when on account of Mahatma Gandhi's pre-eminent guidance in the field of politics, the scope of the Society in the task of political education and agitation has become much narrowed, and the influence and prestige of the Society depend on the usefulness and indispensability of Devadhar's lieutenants in the field of social service, Devadhar's services to the Society and to the country must be considered to be immense, and the loss is almost irreparable.

EDUCATION AND THE DEPRESSED CLASSES.

The Editor,
The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

When I first read the Kavitha incident in the Reformer, there arose in me a great desire to put into writing the reflex side of the affair. But I got over it and said to myself "Why this storm in a tea-cup?" So I dropped writing to you then.

Now Dr. Ambedkar's suggestion at Yeola calling upon the Depressed classes to renounce their social position, has caused a stir in the Indian Press. The balanced view in the matter is that the suggestion is too premature and does not arise from the present attitude of the Caste-Hindus towards the Depressed classes. As a matter of fact, a great change has come over the mentality of the Hindus in the matter of the treatment of the untouchables, due, in a large measure, to the exertions of the Congress in recent times, to remove untouchability and to the activities of the Hindu Maha Sabha in general. This has been admitted by Depressed classes' leaders themselves like Mr. M. C. Rajah and others.

Such a changed attitude is coming to the fore even in rural areas. The admission of Adi-Dravida boys into the Panchayat schools is no longer a thorny question. Such is the shape of things, at present, here in the South.

But what stands in the way of the elevation of the Depressed classes is their own apathy and it is evident from the following:—

In No. 13, North or Vada Eluppai village, Cheyyur Taluk, N. Arcot Dt. (Madras Presidency), there is a Panchayat School. It was inspected in August 1934 by the Deputy-Inspector of Schools, Cheyyur Range, Cheyyur, who remarked in his Inspection Report that Adi-Dravida boys should be re-admitted into the school. In pursuance of the remark, ten Adi-Dravida boys were admitted in April last. They attended the school regularly for some time. Then they began to drop away, one by one, under the convenient excuse of tending cattle for their living. Being a teacher, at present, in the above school and also interested to a certain extent in their progress, many a time I went to the Cheri asking the elders not to stop away their boys and personally calling upon them to attend the institution without fail and not to let the opportunities for education which Government have so willingly placed at their disposal slip through their fingers. But words fell flat. Their attendance began to grow thin; sometimes it is even nil. I got so disgusted with the whole thing that I do not now bother much about it. If the Kavitha incident represents one end of the swing of the pendulum, this shows, to my mind, the other extreme.

Government may come forward to uplift the community, as they are doing at present, even in a larger measure; other bodies like the Congress may do their bit for the Depressed classes. The real step for progress must be taken by the people themselves. The urge for reform and progress must always come from within. Is not self-help the best help? Have you not remarked 'A man is what his shraddha is' some time back in the Reformer?

North Eluppai, } Yours etc.,
23rd November 1935. } E. GOVINDAN.

[The loss to parents so poor as the generality of the depressed classes owing to their children being drawn away to schools, constitute a real hardship and schemes for their uplift should make provision for it. The Government of Mysore allowed a small amount as compensation to such parents. The great saying, quoted by Mr. Govindan in his last sentence occurs in the Bhagavad Gita. The Reformer can not appropriate the compliment he kindly pays us:—Ed., I. S. R.]

"LIFE OF DAYARAM GIDUMAL."

The Editor,
The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

"Young Builder" Press, Karachi, are collecting materials for publishing in English a biography of the late Mr. Dayaram Gidumal, C. S., who along with the late Messrs. B. M. Malabari, Mahadev Govind Kanade, Sir N. G. Chandavarkar and other public workers in the fag-end of the last century gave a strong impetus to the Social Reform movement in Bombay Presidency in particular, and in India in general. He had a large number of friends all over the country. Some of these must be still living. The Editors of the Biography will esteem it a favour if those who were once the contemporaries of the great man would send to the undersigned such information and material, e. g., letters, pamphlets, etc., as may be in their possession. These would be returned to their respective owners, if so desired, after they have been done with.

THE PROTECTION OF THE ASSYRIAN CHRISTIANS OF IRAQ.

Christian circles have been repeatedly disturbed by the precarious and perilous situation of the Assyrian Christians of Iraq, threatened with extermination, and they have intervened on their behalf with the League of Nations, asking that protection may be assured.

It is therefore worth drawing the attention of these same circles to the important decisions taken by the recent Assembly of the League of Nations, which solve in a definite and absolutely satisfactory manner, the problem of the establishment of the Assyrian Christians of Iraq.

After a period of study and the despatch of several missions, and after diplomatic negotiations which revealed, on the part of most governments, a very clear sense of their responsibilities, the settlement of the Assyrians of Iraq, in the plain of the Ghab has been definitely decided upon. In order to facilitate this settlement, the Assembly of the League of Nations has included in its budget for 1936 a sum of 1,800,000 Francs. Added to the contribution from the Government of Iraq, from Great Britain and from the authorities of the territory of the Levant, and to grants from private associations and from those principally concerned, this sum will enable the Assyrians of Iraq to be settled in the region of the Ghab. The total expenditure anticipated for these operations amounts to some 17,000,000 Francs, which will be paid in the course of the next few years as the need arises, under the auspices and with the participation of the League of Nations.

The plain of the Ghab is adequate for the settlement of from twenty to twenty-five thousand people. Large scale works will however be necessary, and while they are being carried out the majority of the Assyrians will be settled on an estate of 8,500 hectares or on other land in the neighbourhood, where they will be able to grow cereals or graze their flocks. Provincial establishments will be made. Five dispensary-infirmaries will be created and it is proposed also, if funds permit, to build a hospital of from 80 to 100 beds. As soon as the works are finished, permanent settlement will take place in the plain of the Ghab itself, where permanent villages will have been built in the meantime. These will take the form of centres accommodating from 2,500 to 4,000 inhabitants, and will be an improvement on scattered villages, since they will facilitate the installation of non-agricultural elements, such as artisans and shop-keepers, will reduce the number of schools, churches, hospitals and dispensaries to be built, and will thus cut down overhead charges.

Plans of a very precise nature, taking the customs of the people concerned into account, are in hand as regards the administration, education, and the civil, religious and political status of the Assyrians. They will be received as permanent colonists in the mandated territory of the Levant and naturalised at a date to be fixed in agreement with the Council of the League of Nations and after a period which in principle should not be less than 5 years.

A special organ will have charge of the direction of the settlement operations, working under the authority of the Council of the League of Nations, and in close liaison with the High Commission for the mandated territories of the Levant.

SRI RAMAKRISHNA GURUKUL AND VIDYAMANDIR—TRICHUR.

The Sri Ramakrishna Asram, Trichur recently published the report on the working of the Sri Ramakrishna Gurukul and Vidyamandir for the years 1933 and 1934. It is a record of steady progress in the educational, social and economic activities that the institution has been carrying on for the Harijans of Kerala from 1927. Started at first with only one Harijan boy, the boys' section of the Gurukul has now a strength of 38 against a strength of 12 in the girls' section. Among them are a few caste Hindus. The Vidyamandir is now a full-fledged Lower Secondary School with a strength of about 400, half of whom, again, are Harijans. Besides giving moral and religious lessons, it affords a system of education suited to the rural areas of Kerala, at the same time giving instruction and guidance in patriotism, cures and the cultural languages of India such as Malayalam, Sanskrit, Hindi and English. There is also an Industrial School attached to this where cloth-weaving, mat-making, drawing, music and needle work are taught. Agriculture also is given its due importance, almost making the Gurukul self-dependent in the matter of vegetables. Practical training in accounting and business is given to boys through their registered Co-operative Society, which conducts a provision store and a book stall. Besides these there are the Children's republic, students' associations, the games club and the Court of Honour to train children to be responsible citizens of the country.

The Asram has also been working among the Harijan population outside, giving them economic relief through co-operative society, benefit fund etc., and helping them to live better lives in better surroundings by founding colonies and giving practical lessons in health, sanitation and cleanliness. It is noteworthy that many of the distinguished educationists, Congressmen and Officials, from all parts of India have visited the Institution and expressed their sincere appreciation of the work carried on by the Asram. The Institution now stands badly in need of funds for extension in accommodation and equipment. The Gurukul building and the shrine for both of which Mahatmaji laid the foundation-stone have yet to be completed. There is also a need for a separate girls' section. Contributions, however small, may be sent to The President, Sri Ramakrishna Asram, Trichur

CASTE AND UNTOUCHABILITY.

In the Harijan of 16th November, there appears an open letter to M. Gandhi written by Sir Govindrao Madgaonkar. In the main body of the letter he clearly states his own position as to the problems of Caste and Untouchability, and in the end appeals to certain persons, whom he regards as Hindu leaders, to 'give a clear lead' and a 'courageous lead' on this vital question.

In this category of Hindu leaders Sir Govindrao mentions myself along with Mahatma Gandhi and Pandit Malaviya. But without presuming to be such a great leader of Hindu opinion as he thinks me, I feel bound to disclose my opinions on the stated questions, because I hold that a man's views on public affairs can be regarded as public property, liable to be disclosed on a legitimate challenge.

Sir Govindrao demands not only a 'clear' lead but also a 'courageous' lead! What he inwardly means by this is obvious! I have no hesitation in accepting the challenge. I do not know whether the answer that I am giving him, in the following few lines, will be clear enough for his purpose. But I am prepared to stand or fall by what I am stating. These opinions of mine have been held by me consistently throughout my life; and being a journalist and active public worker, I had to disclose and state them already on many occasions.

I do not believe in caste as divine. It is man-made and the product of social evolution under particular physical or material conditions. The verse in the Gita about this should be quite clear in its meaning, even to a man of ordinary intelligence. चातुर्वर्ण्यं मया सृष्टं गुणकर्मविभागज्ञः Here वर्ण does not mean caste by birth. The वर्ण of a man is a philosophical interpretation or description of his, regard being had to his mental and spiritual tendencies, taken together with the work which he does under the influence of those tendencies.

If चातुर्वर्ण्यं so defined can be called divine, it is only so much divine as every other thing created in the God's Universe, and also only so much immune from modification or mutation by human agency. Like Sir Govind Rao, I do not believe that Caste, as now understood and observed by Orthodox Hindu opinion, was ordained by the Vedas. It is, no doubt, the product of immemorial custom; but there is no custom which the Hindu Society has no right to change if it so wills rationally. Our sense of the authority of even the Vedas is and must be limited by our sense of what is rationally good for us, that is to say, not particular individuals, but the Hindu Society. I do not think the present water-tight compartments of caste will remain, or ought to remain as they are. Inter-dining or even intermarriage as between different castes is not, theoretically, either a sin against the Hindu Religion or an offence against the Hindu Society. As actual evidence of my own opinions held on this subject I may state that I have (1) supported the Basu Bill, and the Patel Bill, (2) openly joined Sahabhojans (non caste dinners), (3) brought about intermarriages (in my own family) with a view to encourage fusion among the sub-castes of Brahmins.

I have faced ex-communication and even open unpopularity, for some of these things. But my anchor holds. I do not believe in untouchability, and hold that it ought to go and must be removed. I want this not only for strengthening the Hindu Society internally, but also on grounds of absolute justice and fairness.

But while I hold these views theoretically, I have differed and must differ from extreme or revolutionary social reformers, who would like to accomplish all the needed changes and transformations by compulsory legislation. I cannot go in this matter beyond permissive legislation, so that progressive people may be helped to make an experiment of their favourite reform upon themselves, without suffering any undue injury to their civil status. Similarly I am opposed to legislation calculated to coerce orthodox people to admit all or any people to their temples. I wonder if Sir Govindrao knows that I have held, now for years, precisely the same view as he holds about making a distinction between the main building and the inner shrine of a temple. Without being egotistical, I may claim, that I was almost the first in Maharashtra to suggest that as a compromise. My view is that upto a certain line, which marks off the shrine from the open hall, or सभासङ्घ (Sabha Mandap) as it is called, all castes should be free to enter a temple, but that no person, (excepting the consecrated official worshipper) be allowed to enter the sacred shrine, even though he be a Brahmin among Brahmins. This compromise secures three things (1) Satisfaction to the untouchable of having देवदर्शन (Darshan of the deity) direct, if he really hankers for that spiritual blessedness. (2) Assurance to him that he is on the same level of right or privilege with any other class, if what troubles him really is jealousy of the Brahmin. (3) Prevention of the sacred Shrine from pollution due to indiscriminate entry.

I hope I have made my position clear on all the questions referred to in Sir Govindrao's letter.

N. C. KELKAR.

GIRL RECALLS FORMER LIFE.*

Frantic crowds were seen collecting day and night in the Chirakhana Street in the heart of Delhi to have darshan of an eight-year-old girl.

Enquiries made go to show that Shanto Kumari, aged about 8 years, daughter of Mr. Rang Bahadur Mathur, a resident of Chirakhana, Delhi, had been disclosing her past for the last 5 years; but her parents and other relations took it as a trifle and did not at first care to ascertain the truth of the girl's sayings. It was only recently that a gentleman out of curiosity came to see this child and during the talk the girl gave him the name and address of her former husband as she had been doing even previously. This gentleman jotted down the particulars and sent a letter to Pandit Kedar Nath Chaubey of Muttra as told by the girl. The letter, however, reached the person—Pt. Kedar Nath Chaube, who confirmed that the information given in the letter was correct. To further ascertain the fact, Pandit Kedar Nath wrote back that his brother might be allowed to interview the girl. This was arranged. The brother of Pandit Kedarnath came and met the girl who questioned her about their family affairs (in her time in her former life). The girl, to the amazement of all those present, gave replies which were really true to facts. She also disclosed that she had buried some money in a room of their house at Muttra of which she gave the correct description. This convinced him and he wrote to his brother, Pandit Kedar Nath to come to Delhi.

Accordingly, on November 13 last, Pandit Kedar Nath came to Delhi with his son, born of his former wife. The girl recognised them and wept bitterly. Pandit Kedar Nath, when he ascertained the facts from the girl, was moved to tears. The girl showed very great attachment to the son of Kedar Nath whom she recognised as her own son, and gave him dolls and a pack of playing cards.

Pandit Kedar Nath, his son, brother, and his second wife are now staying in Delhi.

It appears that ever since she could talk, she used to say that in her former existence, she was married to a man at Muttra, whose address she gave. Recently, her people communicated this fact to her alleged husband in her past life in Muttra, and he sent his younger brother, whom she identified as soon as she saw him. Her "husband" came from Muttra, and she recognized him also and told him of facts, which were known either to him or to his former wife. Incidentally, she told him that she had buried a hundred rupees at a certain place in their house for the purpose of offering to a goddess, should the child at whose birth she died survive. That child is now eleven years old. The girl explains that before being born in Delhi, she was born at another place and died when she was 2½ years old. The "husband" has gone back to Muttra to look for the buried treasure.

Pandit Neki Ram Sharma, who also visited Delhi in the same connection, gives the following account: "For the last three days I have been constantly visiting Shanti Devi at different hours. I have talked to her and have cross-examined her in connection with her past life. Her replies have been satisfactory and convincing. Though during her present life-time she has never been to Muttra, she describes the city and the 'ghats' as vividly as though she had just been there. I have no reason to doubt her recollection, which she gives of her previous birth. Being of an inquisitive and critical bent of mind, I am not easily led to believe things as described by others, but Shanti's talks leave no doubt in my mind, as to the authenticity of what she says. I want that Shanti should once be taken to Muttra; and if there she can, to some extent, recognize the streets and her 'old home' then what right will those who do not believe in the Hindu belief of the transmigration of soul have to call it untrue?"

Interviewed by a correspondent, Shanti Devi affirmed that in her past life she was the wife of Mr. Kedar Nath Chaube, a cloth merchant of Muttra, and said they used to live in Mohalla Chauban.

She remarked that she was very much in love with her "husband" and for a circumstantial touch, added that she often used to make potato cakes (grantha) for him—a delicacy he particularly liked to eat.

They had a well in their house and a pan supari shop in front of their house. She further stated, and pointed out that in this former existence as Mr. Chaube's wife she had a friend named Chameli (at Muttra) and they were both accustomed to go daily to bathe in the Jumna and used to offer prayers at the Vishram Ghat, which, as everybody knows, is a very holy spot.

The little girl often related these facts to her parents, but they did not take her seriously and did not make any inquiries till four months ago when one day Shanti suddenly insisted on going to Muttra to see her former "husband."

She also said that she had a son at Muttra and she was anxious to see him as it was the birth of that boy that had cost her life. Being opposed, she cried for hours at a stretch and would not be consoled.

Shanti, who is a very pretty girl, is anxious to go back to Muttra to stay with her former husband, but the parents are naturally unwilling to part with her. Meantime, more than a hundred thousand "pilgrims" have visited the merchant's house to see her for themselves.

Willing to Wound But Afraid to Strike:—The representative members of the depressed classes are bitterly complaining that the Indian Press is not giving accurate reports of their meetings and resolution. We realize that such complaints must be very carefully scrutinised for it is very easy to make such a charge when possibly the press itself is not consciously to blame. However, it must be conceded that for the most part the press of India is in the hands of higher castes among the Hindus. Even the English-edited papers have on their staffs high caste Hindus who handle matters that relate to religious affairs in India. This being true, it will be easy to understand why the depressed classes expect little consideration from the high caste Hindus who control the publicity in regard to religious matters. We believe this fear of the depressed classes is probably greater than is warranted though all who know the situation will readily concede that the Hindu reporters will be greatly tempted to suppress matters concerning the depressed classes that are not favourable to Hinduism. However, it must be admitted that reports have been appearing in the papers giving accounts of meetings of depressed classes in which Dr. Ambedkar's position has been supported. But even so the depressed class leaders feel that the high caste Hindus are doing everything in their power to keep out of the papers all favourable comment regarding Dr. Ambedkar's position. Editorially the Indian press appears to be antagonistic to Dr. Ambedkar. There is a very widespread determination at present to force Dr. Ambedkar to make terms with the Maha Sabha. False reports have been given out regarding his willingness to agree to some compromise that may be offered at Poona. In an Associated Press statement he has absolutely denied having had any conversation with representatives of the Maha Sabha. We are left to draw our own conclusions as to how such reports got in the papers. Let us give the press of India every opportunity to deal fairly with this present issue but may we not appeal to those who are in charge of the papers to go out of their way to learn what the real facts are? Let there be no chance for a charge to be made that the depressed classes have not received fair treatment from the press.—The Indian Witness.

Boomerang:—If Christian converts among the depressed classes are given charitable help for most urgent needs there are those who allege that "material inducements are responsible for their change of faith." We wonder what they will say to the case of a Christian girl of Oranganur who embraced Islam on November 14, on marrying a Muslim, and who was entertained at a tea party and presented with a gold medal by the local Muslim community!—Examiner (Roman Catholic.)

NOTES

Dangers of the New Constitution:—Speaking at St. Andrews Day Dinner in Madras Lord Erskine referred to the danger of the demand for linguistic provinces being revived. "We have not heard very much about that subject lately," said his Excellency, "but no doubt that subject will rise again and, if greatly daring, I may give a word of advice to Indian politicians, it would be this. They have set before their eyes the great ideal of a united India. We hear a great deal of India as a nation, and I sincerely hope that the ideal may come true, but I myself do not believe that you can hold that ideal and yet advocate the formation of linguistic provinces. The great achievement of the British in India has been the unity of India and I think that will be acknowledged by almost everybody in this country. I am quite certain, if any one is going to advocate the formation of linguistic provinces, he is going to upset the ideal for which a great many of them have a great affection." Lord Erskine went on with increasing warmth to deprecate strongly the persistence in a demand which, if gained, would throw India back into the condition in which she was before the advent of British rule. These are wise words but they come too late. The new Government of India Act has definitely started India back on the way to pre-British conditions. It has divided the unitary British India into nine or ten statutory provinces. We have accepted the principle of Federation but there was no need to dismember British India in order to fit it into one. We have never heard so far any explanation for this act of vandalism. The great achievement of British rule to which Lord Erskine referred, has been undone by British hands. This to us is the worst feature of the new constitution. Another danger—it is practically the same in a special form—was referred to by Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru in his Convocation address to Patna University graduates. Sir Tej, as one of the British Indian members of the Federal Structure Committee of the Round Table Conference, which decided that British India should be cut up into independent units, must share the responsibility for this fatal transaction. "One danger that I foresee under the new constitution," he said, "is that education, being a provincial subject, our universities and our entire educational system, may tend from a national point of view to become far too provincial or parochial. I sincerely hope and trust that, without in the slightest degree interfering with the autonomy of the provinces, it may be possible to devise some machinery for the interchange of ideas between province and province and to secure some co-ordination and prevent unhealthy competition." Sir Tej was no doubt referring to the Education Board which the Government of India have decided to start. This Board, under far more favourable conditions, was tried and discarded not many years ago. Under the new conditions each province will be far more jealous of its independence and the exchange of ideas will lead to nothing. The only way in which the situation can be retrieved, is to institute a Federal post-graduate university, which will set a high standard to all provincial universities.

Madras and the New Constitution:—Speaking with special reference to his province, Lord Erskine said, with the particular constitution of the Madras Assembly what he himself was terrified of "was a large number of groups none of them owing allegiance to any other, and as a result the Government of the Presidency changing perhaps once a month or perhaps once in six months. Whatever may happen, at the coming elections," he added, "I do hope that some party will get a majority." The position is much the same as regards other provinces except perhaps the two where a statutory majority is guaranteed to one community, though even here the danger of group formation is not altogether absent. In the Punjab for instance, Muslims are divided in three groups, the Ahrars, the Qadianis and the others. Even when one party gets a majority in the elections it may not retain it after them. The following taken from the Times of India's report of the proceedings of the Bombay Legislative Council on Friday the 29th November, is amusing as well as interesting in this connection: "Incidentally Mr. Kulkarni remarked that he was surprised to find in the Council Attendance Book at Poona the addresses of about 12 members mentioned as "18, Queen's Garden Road." Probably it was a "hostel" and they all stayed there. Dewan Bahadur S. T. Kambli strongly took exception to his bungalow being described as a "hostel." Mr. Kulkarni knew very well that his bungalow was at "18, Queen's Garden Road." Mr. Kulkarni pointed out that he was not aware that the Minister's bungalow was situated there. He simply wanted to illustrate that members could not freely vote in the House for some reason or other." The truth is that the new Constitution will almost inevitably leads to the formation of groups in the Legislature not only in Madras but in most other provinces. The only way of counteracting this tendency of the Constitution is to form a strong caucus which from outside the Legislature will direct its proceedings so far as its own members are concerned. This is what the National Congress has been obliged to do and the Justice Party in Madras has been doing. Parliament had two alternatives with regard to the constitution of Indian Legislatures. It could have followed the policy prior to the Morley-Minto reforms of basing the franchise on educational and property qualifications without reference to religious beliefs. Or it should have recognised all religious beliefs and not only three or four as entitled to separate treatment for franchise purposes. In the latter case, Catholics and Protestant Christians should have been given their own electorates. At a public meeting of Catholics held in Bombay to protest against the distribution of seats for Indian Christians proposed by the Bombay Delimitation Committee, a prominent Catholic leader declared that if Bombay Catholics were not given another seat (which had been proposed for Gujarat Christians, mostly Protestants), they would rather be included in the general (non-Christian) constituency. The scheduled castes which are lumped together in electorates, are divided among themselves into numerous groups which hold aloof from one another, and these latter are bound to repeat themselves in the Legislature. We appreciate Lord Erskine's plain speaking but His Excellency, no doubt, realises that the dangers to which he referred are inherent in the new constitution.

S. Sinha on Indian Education:—It was courageous of Mr. Sachchidananda Sinha to maintain with chapter and verse that the Indian Educational system has done meritorious service to the country, at a time when it is being attacked by all sorts and conditions of people, including some eminent Indians, on diverse and often contradictory grounds. We reprint this part of the Convocation address which Mr. Sinha delivered at Lucknow University last week. "It is thus clear," he said, "that while, like all human institutions, our highest educational system is not perfect, yet it has already rendered good and great service to the cause of Indian progress.

I maintain that much of the denunciation of it—even when it is not interested—is wholly unwarranted, if not irresponsible, as evidenced by the declarations I have quoted from eminent authorities." Mr. Sinha rightly stressed the responsibilities devolving on educated Indians as the custodians of national interests and as the vanguard of the country's progress. He poured a little good-humoured scorn on the "man of facts" the 'eminently practical man.' "India," he added, "needs at this juncture not weak-kneed wobblers or mealy-mouthed temporisers, but "bold, very bold though not too bold" leaders and workers possessed of not only patriotism and strength of character, but a will to do and a soul to dare in the assertion and the maintenance of their just rights, even to the verge of being moderately fanatical and who, when occasion really demands it, will ride in the whirlwind and direct the storm." At this point, unfortunately, Mr. Sinha seems to have felt that he had gone a bit too far. He tried, unnecessarily we think, to tone down his high call on Indian youth and made a quotation, of all poets from Robert Browning, in which Bishop Blougram expounds his philosophy of limiting one's exertions to ends which are assured of success without them. This certainly was not Browning's own philosophy but quite its opposite. "If a man's reach does not exceed his grasp, what's a heaven for?" cries Andrea del Sarto in rebuke of Bishop Blougram and his host of followers. This is the ruling idea which pervades Browning's poetry and makes it a powerful tonic to sustain the human spirit in moments of depression. In the last lines that he wrote, the "Epilogue to Asolando," Browning draws a pen-picture of himself, as

One who never turned his back, but marched breast forward,
Never doubted clouds would break,
Never dreamed, though right were worsted,
wrong would triumph,
Held we fall to rise, are baffled to fight better,
Sleep to wake.

Surely, this is a worthier model for our young people than Bishop Blougram.

Indian Troops for Aden:—A Press Communication from New Delhi announced on Monday that at the request of His Majesty's Government the Government of India have agreed to send a battalion of Indian Infantry to strengthen temporarily the defences of Aden. The unit selected is the 5/14th Punjab Regiment from Poona, of which one company is already at Addis Ababa as Legation Guard. There was considerable criticism of the despatch of one company of Indian troops to guard the Legation at Addis Ababa, which was moderated by the sympathy generally felt for Ethiopia. The despatch of a whole Regiment to Aden at the 'request' of His Majesty's Government, at the present time, is conclusive as proof that the Army in India is being maintained at a strength much beyond Indian requirements for Imperial purposes at the expense of the Indian taxpayer. During the debates on the Criminal Law Amendment Bill at the last session of the Legislative Assembly the Home Member drew an alarming picture of the political situation in order to justify the passing of the measure. Conditions in Bengal are still said to demand the maintenance of special measures. In Lahore, the communal conflict between Sikhs and Mussulmans has remained acute for several months. The Government of India can not be expected now to spare troops for the defence of Aden which, against strong protests from India, has been taken out of its control and handed over to the Colonial Office in London.

A Deputation to Dr. Ambedkar :—A deputation of well-meaning Hindu gentlemen from Nasik waited upon Dr. Ambedkar to request him not to carry out his declared intention to leave the Hindu fold. It had a three hours discussion with him and the substance of the talk has been published. Dr. Ambedkar told the members that he has a strong religious sentiment according to his own conception of religion. He was not of those who think that religion is not essential to society. He considered the foundation of religion to be essential to the life and practice of society. He would not undertake the responsibility of starting a new sect. He thought that the Harijan community should be completely absorbed into some powerful community. The Arya Samaj did not satisfy him. There were some difficulties in the way of Harijans accepting Buddhism. They will consider the question of joining Sikhism. The Doctor hates hypocrisy. He has no faith in Hinduism and has decided to renounce it but he does not intend to do so immediately as he wants to carry his community with him. It will take at least four or five years, he thinks, to persuade his community to follow him. If after that period they are not prepared to do so, he will alone change his religion. The annals of religious conversion, record no more deliberate instance of going about the business.

Baroda Government and Joint Family :—In a statement published a year or two ago of social legislation passed in Baroda State it seemed to be assumed that the break up of the Hindu joint family system was an end to be desired. The Baroda correspondent of the Times of India, however, reports that a questionnaire has been issued by the Legal Remembrancer to that Government to find out whether any element of usefulness is served by the retention of the institution under the prevailing conditions of Hindu Society. One great defect of the system, the Baroda Government has already remedied by recognising the wife of a coparcener, on his death, as a coparcener herself and giving the coparcener the right to make a will of his share in the family property. The fact that the joint family persists notwithstanding the many forces at work to undermine it, must be taken to show that there are some benefits which it confers. People will not submit to a system which has completely outlived its usefulness and has become a burden upon them. That, at any rate, is the view which a student of social evolution would take of any long-existing institution. If that be the case, the Baroda Government do well to ascertain it by this enquiry so that if it is found that the benefits of the joint family are incommensurate with its injurious effects and that it should be radically modified, the State may make due provision otherwise for the good objects, such as they are, which the institution still subserves.

The Indian Institute of International Affairs :—We have from time to time urged that Indian publicists should study international affairs in order to get a proper perspective of our own problems. We are glad that it is proposed to start an Indian Institute of International Affairs and that a conference is to be called at Delhi early next year with that object. The signatories of the prospectus observe: "We consider that the formation of an Indian Institute of International Affairs, in affiliation with the Royal Institute would be of great value to this country. There are already in Canada, South Africa and Australia, Institutes of International Affairs, affiliated to the Royal Institute. In India such an Institute would probably consist of an All-India Council, with branches in States and Provinces, somewhat on the lines of the Canadian organization. We hope that eventually it may be possible to establish headquarters for the Indian Institute with a first class library and facilities for the study of, and dissemination of accurate knowledge on, international questions. If the Indian organization were affiliated with the Royal Institute of International Affairs in London, its members would enjoy the full privilege of membership of that body when in London, and would be entitled to use its services as freely as its own members."

The Education in Turkey :—A writer in the Open Court sums up the reforms in education introduced in the Turkish Republic as follows: "Education is thoroughly secularized as well as centralized. In the old days, a large part of the education was given by religious teachers in the Mosque schools. It consisted largely in reciting the Koran and was medieval in spirit. The new government has closed all such schools and placed the children in state institutions. There some lessons are still labeled religious, but these are taught by lay, not clerical teachers, and contain such modern injunctions as the religious duty of supporting the aeroplane society. Private and minority schools are secularized with equal thoroughness, and education must not be used for religious or any other form of propaganda. Friday is the weekly holiday but this is general and far more largely used for rest and recreation than as a day of worship. Whereas a few years ago, most students kept the fast of Ramazan, now few do, and whether fasting or not, teachers and pupils are required to attend to their duties promptly." realpatidar.com

[Dec.]

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

BOMBAY, December 7, 1935.

"A NATION OF BEGGARS."

In his address to the Convocation of Patna University last week Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru declared that he did not want Indians to be a nation of beggars. So long as the British rule the country there is no fear of that contingency, happening. Whatever Britain may do or omit to do for India, she is determined not to pauperise us by her charity. A country which maintains the costly Civil and Military service; which made a gift of one hundred million sterling to the wealthy British overlord; which contributes five shillings in the pound to the income of every inhabitant of Britain; which, even at a time of extreme depression when much richer Governments have felt justified in granting themselves a moratorium for an indefinite period against their creditors, is punctilious in the payment of her foreign obligations; which is the only country in the world to allow the free export of her gold assets; and which is ready to raise large sums for sundry celebrations; is certainly in no danger of becoming branded as "a beggar nation." It is astonishing how a man of Sir Tej's intellectual acumen should pitch upon an inconsiderable item like Indian education as the root factor of the economic situation, overlooking the main factors which stare one in the face when one allows oneself the misery of contemplating it. But terrible are the devastating effects of a fixed idea. To safeguard India against this imagined danger, Sir Tej prescribed a triple remedy. The Leader of Allahabad in a weighty leading article shows that the "triune" reform put forward by the learned Convocation orator, is not new, that it has been tried in different parts of India and had failed to commend itself to the public. The Chief Editor of the Leader was the first Minister of Education in the United Provinces under the Montagu reforms and, everybody is agreed, he was no dummy Minister. In his short term of office he managed to effect important educational reforms. "In his (Sir Tej's) view," writes the Leader, "our primary education should be brought 'more into harmony with rural conditions' and secondary education should be made self-sufficient and not subservient, as it is at present, merely to university education. It is no disparagement of these ideas to say that they are not new. Expression has been given to them many times before and during many years. Also, attempts have been made to reorganize both primary and secondary education on the lines suggested by Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru, but it is true to say that success did not attend those attempts." Sir Tej would seem to be unaware of what had been attempted in his own province in the way of educational reform. The Leader goes on to point out that some years back an attempt was made to reform primary education in the direction indicated by Sir Tej and it failed. Attempts made in Madras, Bombay, Bengal and the United Provinces to make secondary education independent of the Universities by instituting a School Leaving examination, have also failed. The Leader states briefly what happened to them in other provinces but, as it does not seem to be aware of what happened in Bombay, we may supply the omission. Lord Sydenham's Government in their determination to make secondary education completely independent, went so far as to make the Matriculation examination of the latter a disqualification for the subordinate Government services. We can not go here into the controversy which raged over this reform. It was settled by handing over the School Leaving examination to the University, which, after a decent interval, 'amalgamated' it with the Matriculation. Technical education schemes have likewise been disappointing in their results. "Limiting ourselves to these provinces," says the Leader, "we have here a number of technical and industrial schools designed to wean young men from the craze for the services and what are called the learned professions. But outside the artisan class a large number, if not the majority, of the products of these institutions simply seek for employment somewhere." The experience is not peculiar to the United Provinces.

We shall be told that the people do not understand what is good for them, and they should be led if necessary by force to adopt what their betters think good for them. That is the political ideology of Fascism, Hitlerism, Sovietism. Dr. Ambedkar in his latest pronouncement has expressed a longing for a social dictator. Does Sir Tej long similarly for an educational dictator? The other and the more statesmanlike way of looking at the question, is, first, to find out what the difficulties are which prevent people from adopting the reforms suggested by Sir Tej, if they are otherwise desirable. First, as to primary education. We do not understand what is meant by saying that the present system does not sufficiently harmonise with rural requirements. The primary schools teach in the main the "three R's" which are not different in cities from what they are in villages. Further the distinction between rural and urban is largely artificial in this country. Nearly 80 percent of the population of Bombay—one of the few really urbanised areas in the country—is born in the districts. The large disparity between the male and female population shows that a considerable proportion of the population leave their women in the village home. The contact with the country is thus never interrupted. The main difficulty in the way of housing the workers is that they do not accommodate themselves to the conditions of city life. That is one side of the question. The other is, that owing to this uninterrupted contact between town and village, the rural outlook itself is being transformed. Has Sir Tej, we wonder, thought of the tremendous effect which the setting up of a painted petrol pump in the outskirts of a village, has on the villagers?

mind and manner of living? Less than twenty five years ago Bandra was a peaceful village, more country than town. Today motor cars and buses shriek along from morning to night and the very beasts on their tired tramp to the slaughter house, have learnt to be alert to move out of the way at the hoot of the motor horn. The effect of improved communications and means of transport on administrative theories, long regarded as axiomatic, has not been adequately realised. In Mysore over a hundred villages have already been and a large number of others are being electrified. It means nothing short of a revolution in the rural mind. And then there is the social bond which runs like a thread stringing up town and village together in a wondrous continuity. In the West itself the distinction of rural and urban, is being reduced by the substitution of electric for steam power. We have to make village life attractive to educated men as the first step in the reconstruction of national life. Not long ago, the slogan of the educational reformer was "a broad highway from elementary school to the university," which should be free to every child, whether rich or poor. The new cry is rather patterned on the lines of birth control. Education is to be rationed and admission to schools regulated by a Commissar of Education, according to the number of jobs available at a given moment. Every educated man who happens to be without a paid job, however valuable his work may be to the community, is to be stamped with the stamp of "wastage." The only effect of the present propaganda will be to close a number of colleges and schools with nothing to take their place.

BIRTH CONTROL AND POPULATION.

If Place's treatise on Population is taken as the precursor of the Birth Control Movement—and all the early writers have undoubtedly drawn their inspiration from it—the theory of Birth Control has just about completed a hundred years. During this period attempts have been made by its supporters, on the one hand, to show its necessity from every aspect and by its opponents, on the other, its inadvisability. Since Place had developed his theory out of Malthus, it is but natural that the economic aspect should have first attracted attention and that even today a certain importance should be attached by birth control advocates to it. Briefly stated, this was that population tended to outstrip means of subsistence, that men increased faster than foodstuffs and that unless preventive checks were adopted there would soon come a time when there would be not enough to go round. Malthus contemplated late marriages and self-control before marriage as the main checks. Place advocated physical checks. Malthus had based his theory on one economic fallacy, that the population increase outstrips food production to a tremendous extent. Place and the birth controllers added one more fallacy to this in building up their programme, that the provision of easy methods of birth control will maintain the balance. So far as Europe is concerned Malthus' theory was never held seriously. Ireland which Place refers to as the great refutation of opponents of Malthus, the 'Promised Land of the principle of population' according to Karl Marx, was shown by Thomas Sadler as early as 1829 to prove that poverty was not proportional to population but in inverse ratio thereto. No European community today thinks of reducing its birth-rate. Many of them are seriously perturbed about the phenomenal fall that has occurred in it. Italy, Germany and France are considering methods to send up their population. "The trivial doctrine of Malthus," writes Spengler in his Hour of Decision, "is based on the idiotic idea that economic crises can be surmounted by an atrophied population." So little danger is there of population outstripping means of subsistence, that we have yet to hear of any country in Europe turning from industry to agriculture, as is bound to happen if there were a serious threat of food-shortage. On the contrary, Russia is industrialising and Central Europe shows to less degree the same tendencies. More astonishing still in America, North and South, crops are grown to be destroyed, fish is hurled back into the sea, and, the world over, production is governed not by the economics of use but by the economics of profit. The "Encyclopaedia Britannica" gives the clue to the Eastward trend of Birth Control interests when, after remarking that imperialism and industrialism have rendered Malthus obsolete, it asserts that in the East "the Malthusian principle still seems to reign supreme." Because Europe and America have a declining birth-rate, India and China must also have the same. The obvious method of raising the standard of living which means nothing more, or less, than the scale of living which the average individual considers preferable to marriage, is inconsistent with imperialism. Therefore, birth control methods, which as we will show later, are futile in checking population.

India is supposed to present all the dangers of over-population because the introduction of European medicine has checked disease—one of Nature's ways of adjusting population. In strong conflict to this is the birth-controller's contention that he seeks to check high infant mortality by his methods. This seems to be based on the fallacy that a high birth-rate is the cause of a high death-rate. While Doubleday holds the reverse is the case, Mayo-Smith maintains that there is no connection between the two. But that not enough is being done for the public health of this country cannot be denied. One turns with despair from the record of excellent welfare service and child care in other parts of the Empire to India in George Allen and Unwin's handy reference volume, "The Empire Social Hygiene Year-Book." In the 1935 publication we find the following, "The recent financial crisis has caused a serious set-back. In one Province the post of Director of Public Health was actually held in abeyance for two years and the duties of the post were entrusted to the Inspector-General of Civil Hospitals.....The provision of hospitals in India and dispensaries is as good as can be expected, considering the financial condition of the country, but public health is still in a rudimentary condition except in the larger towns and cities. There is an obvious need for awakening the public health conscience of India. Great differences exist in the policies of the various provinces now that they are independent of central control. Those who are in charge of public health in India have the superhuman task of maintaining the health of people who are undernourished." After this indictment the Year-Book concludes with the astounding remark that the people are undernourished because the production of the necessities of life is not increasing in the same proportion as the population. This is creating a confusion between shortage of food and shortage of money. Any student of Indian economics will know that the area under cultivation for food-stuffs is proportionately less today to the land cultivated for, say, cotton than it was fifty years ago. Nothing has been done, so far as we know, to reclaim a proportion of the cotton lands for food production. On the other hand, cotton cultivation is receiving so much attention that food crops are being relegated to inferior soil. Again Dr. Hutton who urged that a society which encouraged "Baby-Week Shows" should also preach birth control, has suggested in his Census Report for 1931 that the pressure on land be relieved by rapid industrialisation. The remarks of the writer in the Empire Year Book are a tacit admission that the State has failed in grappling with the first problems of Indian life. Those who smugly urge India's financial soundness on the ground that her credit is high, will do well to ponder over the admission in the paragraph quoted above that the hospital provision in the country is "as good as can be expected considering the financial condition of the country." It is the height of irony that Mrs. Margaret Sanger should come to a people whose main problem is providing food for undernourished men and women and tell them, as she did in a radio talk last Saturday, that birth control was going to solve the problems of national life and enable India to work out her great role in "influencing the spiritual development of the nations of the world." We should be glad if Western visitors would refrain from a cheap method of gaining popularity in this country. Mrs. Sanger, if she really means what she says, must be a very recent convert. For she wrote in 1929 ("Sex in Civilisation" page 537): "The changing attitude towards contraception...is one of the eloquent indices of the triumph of the new scientific morality. It indicates the laying of a solid foundation for the civilisation of the future. This, I venture to prophesy, will differ from the so-called civilization of the East which has erected its structure on the ugly basis of human slavery and misery. It will be a civilisation of a healthy and happy wordliness."

It has been claimed that birth control has been an effective factor in reducing the European birth-rate. But, to take one instance, the process by which England came to her low birth-rate is interesting and should be instructive to supporters of the movement. It is only necessary to state here that the transformation of a self-reliant community into a parasitic one almost invariably synchronises with the fall in its birth-rate. The proof of this statement exists in three dates in the history of British Imperialism: The year 1857, when the Government of India passing into the hands of the English State instead of an English Company opened up a great field for exploitation to the people; the year 1869, the opening of the Suez Canal and the quick route to India and the East; and the year 1871 from which date Birth Control workers calculate their influence towards family limitation. But the English birth-rate was falling even before 1871. Other factors include the growth of democracy which quickens and extends the desire to rise in the social scale, and the progress of "civilisation" with the creation of fresh needs and desires, higher expenditure, and the consequent postponement of marriage. But the main reason lies in the reduced fertility during the last fifty years owing to the existence of an artificially high standard of living. The case of Russia conclusively proves that before you preach birth control or restriction the people must feel the desire to have small families. What succeeded in Europe because of the aversion to have babies—the remarkable fall in the number of illegitimate births should alone prove this and we were surprised to hear from Mrs. Sanger's radio talk her emphasis on birth control being restricted to married people—failed in Russia because there the people want to have children. The Russian woman, writes Spengler, will make good in ten years what Russia sacrificed in the Revolution. Romanoff remarks that the proletariat were distinguishable from the educated because the first had a preponderance of children and the latter of dogs. The East which centres its whole social and religious fabric round the family unlike the individualistic Englishman, resembles the Russian proletariat (or Oriental Russian) rather than the educated (or Westernised) Russian, in this matter.

The claim of Birth Control propagandists that the advocacy of their methods has had any serious influence on the birth rate, as well as the fear of their opponents that those methods would result in race suicide, is much exaggerated. The following extract from Dr. George R. Scott's "The Truth about Birth Control" goes a long way to demonstrate it:—"The Fabian Society sent out a questionnaire. Of the 316 persons from whom replies were received 242 were adopting restrictive measures and 74 were letting things take their course. The average number of children per family was, of the first class 2.7, and of the second 2.88. A similar inquiry undertaken by the National Birth Rate Commission elicited 477 replies, of which 287 used restrictive methods. In this case the average number of children in the restricted families was 2.4, and where no restrictive measures were adopted 1.6. The third inquiry was conducted by Lady Willoughby de Broke, and here the averages were 3 1/8 and 2 1/2 respectively. Now the significant point in connection with these inquiries is that in two of them, where contraceptive measures were employed, the average number of children resulting was in excess of the average where no such methods were used." It might be urged that the groups among whom the inquiries were made, were peculiar. In the case of Russia where Birth Control propaganda has not only failed in checking population but has even resulted in sending it up, it is argued that there is really no such propaganda! Fannina Halle, however, confidently asserts that not only is birth control propaganda allowed, it is encouraged by the State. Dr. Scott's remarks on Holland will prove unanswerable. He writes, "The case of Holland is even more significant. It is extremely unlikely that there is any country in the world where birth control is more widely practised than in Holland. It has the distinction of having the first privately instituted birth control clinic, established as long ago as 1885, when, in any other country in the world, it is probable that any such step would have led to the instigator being clapped into jail. There are clinics in all the cities and they are controlled by the Dutch Neo-Malthusian League, which is recognized by the Government and was granted a Royal Charter of Public Utility in 1895. So much for the position of birth control in Holland. Naturally one would expect Holland's birth-rate, if what the Malthusians and the anti-birth controllers say were true, to be the lowest in Europe, certainly lower than that of England where the practice of contraception is still surreptitious, than that of France where it is a criminal offence. But what is the truth? To the everlasting and eternal confounding of the arguments of Malthusians and anti-contraceptionists both, the truth is that Holland's birth-rate stands at 2.38 higher considerably than that of England, of France, of Germany, of the U.S.A." The reason for this seems obvious. Apart from the fact that no cent per cent contraceptive has been discovered, apart from the inevitability of human error involved in any man-made apparatus, there is the impossibility of men observing systematically every detail day after day for years on end. It is surprising that birth-controllers who have been realists enough to confront their self-restraint opposers with the case of the man who had intercourse three times during a married life of six years and three children resulted, should fail in advancing birth control as a population check to contemplate the certainty, human nature being what it is, of contraceptive users neglecting precautions three times in six years with the same result.

INDIANS IN EAST AFRICA.

India's connection with Africa is of ancient duration. "Eastern Africa," wrote David Livingstone in his book on the Zambesi, "has been occupied from the most remote times by traders from India and the Red Sea." The connection has continued up to the present day. Writing in 1859 General Rigby British Consul said:—"Zanzibar is rapidly becoming the chief emporium of trade on the East Coast, and it all passes through the hands of British subjects. Nearly all the shops here are kept by Banians and Borahs; this is now the chief mart for supplying all the world with cloves, ivory and gum-coral, and there is a great and increasing trade in gums, hides, oil-seeds, sandalwood, dyes, cowries of which many shiploads are taken to the West Coast, and exchanged for palm-oil. Hostilities here would ruin all this, and impede civilization half a century. The Zanzibar dominions extend for 1,100 miles along the coast; they would break up into a number of petty states, and there would be no check on the slave trade." The following passages taken from the General's memorandum referring to Indians in Zanzibar, will be read with interest:—"The number of natives of India residing in the Zanzibar territories is between five and six thousand, and is annually increasing. They consist chiefly of Banians from Kutch and Jamnuggar, and of Khojas and Bhorhas—Mahomedan sects from Kutch, Surat and Bombay. Nearly all the shops in the Zanzibar bazaars are kept by these people, and almost all the foreign trade of the port passes through their hands. They are gradually acquiring all the wealth and property of the island and the Arabs, from their indolence, and want of honesty and fair dealing, are becoming impoverished. Banians are established in considerable numbers at all the towns and villages on the opposite coast of the mainland, also at Mozambique, Ebou and other Portuguese settlements. The Khojas and Bhorhas have settlements on the west coast of Madagascar, and at the French colonies of Nossi Beh and Mayotta. The Banians never bring their families or females from India, and always look forward to a return to their country after having acquired a competence, but the Khojas and Borahs bring their wives and children, and become permanent settlers. They are a very thrifty, industrious people. A new quarter of the town, entirely inhabited by these Indian Mohammedans, has recently sprung up, and is rapidly increasing; each bungalow from Kutch usually brings a number of Khoja families as settlers. There is not a single Armenian or Jew residing at Zanzibar, and only about a dozen Persians. Several shops have recently been established by Portuguese from whom there is one Parsee, who unites the office of doctor, tin-worker and guildler." The knowledge of the history of the African Continent, is useful and, indeed, necessary to Indian problems in East Africa and part from that, it is obvious that the continent of Africa will add immensely to the economic resources and solidarity of the world and it is the right no less than the duty of India to make her contribution to it.

Livingstone found that, contrary to the general belief in Europe in his day, the Africans had their own civilization and were industrious and peaceful with a few exceptions. The institution of slavery which has become so closely associated with Africa, was first instituted by the Arabs. But the slaves of the Arabs were domestic slaves and were treated with kindness. "There can be little doubt," writes Mrs. Russell in the Life of her father, General Rigby, "that the Slave Trade which stained the world with almost incredible iniquity for less than a hundred years ago, and left the very foulest blot on the history of the nineteenth century, was almost wholly due, at least in its worst aspects, to European impact on the unhappy races of Africa. What does not America, what does not Europe, with all the material advances due to its colonies, its imports and the industries dependent on them, owe to the agonies of the black man without whose labour so much that we white races reckon as civilization would never have been? Never in all History has there been cruelty on a vaster scale, never a more ghastly callousness to human suffering, never greater wastefulness of human life which we regard as the most valuable of all earth's products, than during the years of which the European races, when their thoughts, as almost invariably, are turned only on themselves and their "Progress", are so proud." Mrs. Russell cites by way of illustration the testimony of Livingstone who, during his first visit to the Manganga country, found the whole population engaged in the cultivation and working up of cotton. He had never seen, he said, such wonderful cotton country or such fertile land in his life. But a year or two afterwards he found this same country entirely depopulated and all the huts full of dead bodies. Country he found so thickly populated in 1859 that there were villages every two miles or less, was so changed that, revisited in 1861, he had to cross a tract of 130 miles without meeting a human being. The Portuguese were easily pre-eminent as the worst and most cruel of slave holders. The British Consul at Mozambique in a book which he published in 1860 wrote: "They (the Portuguese) display a refinement of cruelty which I am not aware exists in any other slave-holding communities... The son is made to flog his mother and his sister, the father flogs his daughters and also the woman who bore them for him—all at the command of their owner, who can do with them what he pleases. Women are made to flog—and that under circumstances too revolting to be told." Next to the Portuguese the French were the worst sinners, although the first anti-slavery laws were promulgated at the time of the French Revolution. Persia and Arabia come next in the list. The United States was a great delinquent. During eight months in 1861, thirteen out of seventeen vessels known to have escaped the Vigilance of their Navy with 12,000 slaves, carried American colours. Great Britain notwithstanding her legal prohibition was for long deeply implicated in the nefarious traffic. By 1865-67 Englishmen had erected large factories in Africa and planted estates with sugar cane, and all their workers were slaves. Indians too had a hand in the trade; during 1859-61, 25,000 Negro slaves are said to have been imported into Kathiawar and Cutch. The Rev. S. Waller, writing in 1890, said that the ferocious Arab half-caste who haunted central Africa was perfectly justified in stating to all who would listen to him that the English were only too glad to use slaves when they can. Stanley writing in the Morning Post in 1893, estimated that 20,000 porters per month left the East Coast for the interior, employed by the British, German and Congo State administrations, the Roman Catholic Mission, the London and other religious missions, the Arabs with their caravans, European traders, Government Agents, agriculturists, tea and coffee planters, hunters and tourists. They were mostly slaves.

CHINESE RECONSTRUCTION AND THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS

Among the members of the League of Nations, China occupies a special position. She has suffered most from the political ineffectiveness of the League. In the affair of Manchukuo, all that Geneva agitation achieved was to create a feeling in Chinese minds that international opinion would not tolerate Japanese aggression against her. But Chinese nationalism soon realised it was depending on a forlorn hope. The British Ambassador at Addis Ababa, no doubt, applied the lesson of Manchukuo when he advised the Ethiopian Emperor to make peace directly with Italy instead of troubling the placid waters of Geneva. On the other hand, China has benefitted most from the social, economic, cultural and humanitarian activities of the League. The principle of disinterested international help contemplated by the League in the case of industrially backward countries has been worked to the fullest in China. It is not surprising, therefore, that M. Haas, Director of the Transit Section and Secretary of the League Committee on technical co-operation with China, should have found during his investigations in China (January-May 1935) that Chinese public opinion today gives priority to national reconstruction and economic and technical revival in contrast to the emphasis in 1923 on international status as a fully sovereign state. As a representative of the League, M. Haas went to China to inquire into the present conditions and immediate prospects of technical co-operation between the League and the Chinese Government as well as organisations engaged in the work of reconstruction. In view of the failure of the League to do anything to preserve the integrity of Chinese territory, it would have been futile and farcical for Chinese leaders to have urged the maintenance of her full sovereign status in discussions with him. It might moreover have proved exceedingly embarrassing to M. Haas. There was, on the other hand, much to be gained in concentrating on questions relating to internal administration. It was both courteous and practical of the Chinese leaders who met M. Haas to have avoided the international and stressed the economic problems of modern China.

M. Haas' report on his mission is now available to us and it is of great interest to Indians as a contrast to the manner in which we have received training in Western technique. The growth of European influence in China has been gradual. As Mr. H. N. Brailsford remarked in an article in The Aryan Path Westernisation is growing in China along with national needs. Therefore, M. Haas is able to assert that in almost all branches of national reconstruction, in spite of the economic crises, unremitting efforts are being made, sometimes in the face of political difficulties and uncertainties. "It is not enough," writes M. Haas, "to describe the work in progress and the results obtained. An account ought also to be given of the encouraging state of mind of the collaborators of the Central Government associated in reconstruction work; not of all certainly but of many, and no doubt a growing number, of specialists, of modest experts; witness should be borne to their zeal—a zeal devoid of illusions, but nevertheless confident—and to their perseverance in acquiring the necessary competence. The value of their services is not always sufficiently appreciated outside China or even in their own country. Below the leaders and often far removed from them there is no lack of collaborators who are ardently devoted to the work of reconstruction. To an increasing extent in every technical sphere and doubtless in nearly every part of the country, young men are to be found who are working modestly, courageously, silently, aware of the obstacles and methodically attacking them." In the field of industrialisation, M. Haas observes that room is found for local arts and crafts. The methods of constructing, maintaining and financing a system of roads, the rules for irrigation and for the development of public health in rural areas are adjusted to the needs, habits and social structure of the communities affected. Hence the average Chinese, peasant or proletarian, has no aversion to progress in itself.

M. Haas describes the structure of the economic organisation in modern China. The main development stressed in all the provinces is road and rail construction and hydraulic works and the Central Government, too, attaches much value to this section. The National Economic Council serves as a link between the various Ministries, between public and private reconstruction organisations, and between the various reconstruction departments in the provinces and the Central Government. It was organised in 1931 when the Chinese Government invited League co-operation in its work of modernisation. The Economic Council devotes its attention to road communications, hydraulic works, public health and rural economy. Public health workers are under a system of centralisation and the outstanding success achieved in this department has been largely the result of this co-ordination. The co-operative movement in China has outgrown the hopes of its promoters and steps are likely to be taken for the early establishment of a centre for training and directing workers in this field.

A deliberate effort is being made by the Health Service to train and build up units of specialists, doctors, sanitary engineers, nurses and midwives, for work in the rural areas. "It has been forced to depart," writes M. Haas, "from the practice generally followed in Western countries and, in view of the inability of the majority of the population to pay for attendance and medicine, it has had to adopt the bold conception of the medical profession as a public service." Similar co-ordination does not exist in the other activities of the National Economic Council, the need for provincial initiative in them being apparently considered to compensate for the lack of central control. The wisdom of the Chinese decision to centralise public health has a lesson for Indians, if they need one after the breakdown of the system under provincial control. M. Haas' report is not so much an assessment of work already done as an estimate of the vast potentialities and the ability of the Chinese people to develop their own resources. As such it is most encouraging. "Public opinion," he says, "is already more critical of inertia or timidity than of boldness, of insufficient than of excessive initiative." The nature of co-operation sought for from the League and obtained, is assistance in training the Chinese technical staff and in increasing its efficiency, and in gaining access to the experience of other countries.

It is of interest to see how the Chinese who were rightly distrustful of foreign influence, came to invite League assistance. It would not be far wrong to trace this new trend to the influence of Japanese example. In the Manchukuo affair, China was made to feel the uselessness of her being in the right in the face of her disunity and economic backwardness. The argument that Japanese conquest alone could help her industrial progress, necessitated her putting her own house in order. For the same reason which led Abyssinia to invite League co-operation in the face of Italian aggression, China had to take Geneva into her confidence as far as her industrial programme was concerned. Moreover the League method was the only alternative to domination by one or other of the imperial powers that were awaiting their opportunity in China. M. Haas is apparently under the impression that for a long time to come the League will play a part in Chinese reconstruction and even that the scope of its activities will extend. We do not think so. Such a development will inevitably mean the breakdown of the League in a sphere where it is today very successful. Its greatest achievement will be when China has grown out of the need of continuous assistance from Geneva.

THE EVILS OF ECONOMIC NATIONALISM.

The Economic Committee of the League, in a report entitled "Remarks on the Present Phase of International Economic Relations," paints in strong colours the evils that flow from economic nationalism. "Thanks to our cheap and rapid means of communication," the report points out, "the nations are now so close to one another that, in terms of time and cost of transport, the whole of present-day Europe is no larger than the Switzerland of yesterday."

"These are the real dimensions of the economic territory in which we are living, and, when we think of the obstacles of all kinds at present impeding traffic within this limited space, we no longer feel any inclination to smile at the memory of an Italy divided in the days of Mazzini into seven or eight different Customs territories or a Germany scarred, in the time of Goethe, by thirty-nine Customs frontiers."

"The world would be much nearer the restoration of comparative liberty in international trade if everyone were imbued with a conviction of the affinity, one might almost say the blood relationship, existing between our national economy, whatever its form, and what we call external economy."

"If a wall of monetary and commercial prohibitions could spring up by enchantment overnight, between, say, Paris and the Northern Departments, London and Manchester, or Berlin and the Ruhr, a fact of which many people are ignorant or which they refuse to admit, would be suddenly and irresistibly brought home to them."

"In order to make the effects of economic nationalism easier to realise, the report traces the various stages in the impoverishment of the taxpayer that results from economic nationalism. Balancing budgets, it points out, becomes an extraordinarily complicated task so soon as international trade encounters obstacles as serious as those existing at present."

"Amongst the first to suffer from these difficulties are the producers—industrial or agricultural—who work for export. In every modern State, such producers invariably constituted a large element of the population and represent important interests. Now, stagnation need only set in in one sector to be felt throughout the whole national organism. In point of fact, as they lose their foreign custom, exporters cut down their purchases. Textiles buy less from the spinning-mills; the engineering trades buy fewer metallurgical products; agriculturists, smaller amounts of fertilisers and of industrial products. The wave of depression starting at the frontier spreads slowly over the whole country. First, certain machines come to a standstill, staff is dismissed, a few factories close down, unemployment becomes chronic.

"For the undertakings affected, profits fall, often they dry up altogether. Reserves gradually dwindle to nothing, as it becomes necessary to draw on them."

"For those who have scant or no reserves, it becomes difficult to meet the claims of creditors beset with the same difficulties. Fixed charges—debts, interest on bonds, mortgages, rates and taxes of all kinds, house and farm rent—remain unchanged, but there is a decline in the capacity to meet them. Bankruptcies become more frequent."

"For the budget, there will be two consequences—the weakening of the taxpayers' capacity and the growth of expenditure under the heads of unemployment and other relief necessitated by the economic depression."

The way in which this process operates is traced in some detail in a series of sections entitled, respectively: "Contraction of transport and transport deficits"; "Decay of the tourist traffic"; "Emergency relief to agriculture"; "Shook to the monetary foundations and multiplication of measures of self-defence"; "International financial difficulties create new dangers for the budget." The international economic situation is reflected in the national budgets.

The growth of economic nationalism is traced back to the endeavours in different countries to escape the effects of the economic depression. Production, it is pointed out, is now recovering, but predominantly on a national basis, so that, "while the crisis tends to diminish, the machinery of international trade becomes more and more jammed. Of these two evils, the latter is now the more serious, and calls, accordingly, the more urgently for treatment."

The chief obstacle to breaking down the barriers to international trade is said to be the resistance of private interests.

"In the sphere of commercial policy (apart, of course, from a series of other causes, national or international, monetary or commercial, which may influence or even determine this policy), Governments have to count with the resistance of individuals and groups who, while they are quite ready to talk of the interdependence of peoples, are naturally not concerned with anything but the interests of their own particular branch of production. It is from this necessarily one-sided standpoint that these individuals and groups continually demand the enforcement of the measures the paralysing effect of which on international economic relations has been summarised above."

"For the same reason, the parties concerned see in these measures at the outset only the momentary advantages to their own particular business, while they fail to perceive or disregard the direct or indirect repercussions by which other categories of producers and traders will be primarily affected. The latter will in turn invoke Government help; and there will thus arise in the national sphere between the different classes of producer the very same process of spontaneous generation which has already been observed as between countries in the international sphere."

"It is some time before the collective pressure of all these successive actions makes itself felt. It will continue to make itself felt in proportion as its intensity is increased by the international repercussions (in the monetary, financial, commercial, tourist, railway and budgetary domains) to which reference has been made above."

"In all this (which is no more than the everyday record—the eminently human everyday record—of the commercial policy of most countries and which creates considerable difficulties for the negotiators of commercial treaties) there is nothing which can be said to be of decisive importance in periods when international trade is not arrested by insuperable barriers, but in spite of Customs duties pursues its upward way.

"But when a situation develops as serious as the present, where restarting of the international machinery takes precedence of all other needs, it is easy to see the possible consequences of this failure to distinguish clearly between individual interests and national interests. The position calls for the adjustment of a certain number of national policies. That is difficult enough in itself; but it becomes a desperate undertaking if each of these national policies, instead of being based on general principles, takes the form of an inchoate series of separate, and frequently inconsistent, measures. The least that can happen in such a case is that it becomes impossible to see the wood for the trees."

What makes economic nationalism even more intolerable, says the report, is that "in many cases the resumption of industrial activity is, in point of fact, connected directly or indirectly with the manufacture of war material and army reorganisation. It is needless to insist on the dubious and psychologically depressing economic character of such activities."

The report concludes that the situation is now such "as to imply work of the highest importance which Governments alone can carry through and which they cannot delegate to the parties concerned. In many countries this is beginning to be realised, and the fact that this is so is of good augury for the future."

"But, even whilst proceeding with the requisite caution, the Governments must nevertheless realise the fact that a depression so serious as the present one calls for exceptional remedies, and they must accordingly bring home to their public opinion the necessity for accepting certain sacrifices, which will, moreover, assist in creating a sounder national economic system and in preparing the way for recovery."

"For, despite all care and caution, there will always be plenty of people to assert that, if to-morrow the doors were thrown wider open to imports, appalling catastrophes would inevitably occur. If the abolition of quotas were contemplated, there is probably not one branch of producers that would not be prepared to prove to the Government, with figures in support, that such a decision would be bound to result in the ruin of their industry, not to mention increased unemployment and a whole series of other misfortunes which would involve the equally certain ruin of the whole nation. In support of such assertions—of which many would be made in good faith and whose weakness consists chiefly in the fact that they are based on the situation as it is to-day and not on the situation that might arise to-morrow under the influence of a policy of expansion—a whole series of reasons would be adduced, which it would be difficult to resist on account of their honourable character; reasons relating, for instance, to the independence of the country in the event of war, national defence requirements, etc."

"That is why the re-establishment of the essential minimum flow of international trade which alone can arrest the world on the steep slope down which it is slipping to disaster, presupposes nowadays in Governments, especially in creditor countries, a very lofty sense of their responsibility, much firmness and a determination not to allow private interests, however reputable, to paralyse the great work which is indispensable in the interests of the nation."

UNIVERSITY EDUCATION AND NATIONAL LIFE.*

It is just one hundred years since Thomas Babington Macaulay, as the President of the Board of Education, closed a long chapter of controversy about the system of education to be introduced into India, with the recording of his historic Minute which for its unhesitating self-assurance and sweeping generalization, ranks as a remarkable document in polemical literature, and was characteristic of the controversial methods of its author. Amongst other things he said, I shall quote the memorable passage which struck the key-note:—"The question before us is simply whether, when it is in our power to teach this language (English), we shall teach languages in which, by universal experience, there are no books on any subject which deserve to be compared to our own; whether, when we can teach European science, we shall teach systems which, by universal confession, wherever they differ from those of Europe, differ for the worse; and whether, when we can patronize sound philosophy and true history, we shall countenance, at the public expense, medical doctrines which would disgrace an English farrier, astronomy which move laughter in girls at an English boarding-school, history abounding in kings thirty feet high and reigns thirty thousand years long, and geography made of seas of treacle and seas of butter."

None could have clinched the matter (from the European as opposed to Indian stand-point) as could and did Macaulay. Accordingly, on March 7, 1835, just one hundred years back, the Governor-General, Lord William Bentinck, issued the epoch-making Resolution in which it was unequivocally laid down that "the great object of the British Government ought to be the promotion of European literature and science among the natives of India." Well, just a century has elapsed since, and probably hundreds of thousands of Indians have been educated in this fairly long interval according to the system then introduced. About a quarter of a century later, the first three Indian universities were established, which now number six times as many. There can be, therefore, no better way of celebrating the centenary of this tremendous change in the educational history of India than by surveying briefly, in a convocation address, the results of university education in our country, and its influence on our life and activities.

As a matter of fact, the results of University education in India have been carefully examined, from time to time, by highly competent authorities, from different standpoints, and there has been a consensus of opinion that higher education in this country has been, on the whole, a success, and that it has brought in its train wholesome and beneficial results. To confine attention to recent times, Lord Curzon—who was by no means an unqualified admirer of our system of higher education, and who tried to "reform" it according to his lights—speaking (in the closing years of the last century) as Chancellor of the Calcutta University—made the admission that the knowledge imparted by the Universities "had not been shamed by her children." Later, his Government confirmed that view in an elaborate resolution. Another and still more authoritative testimony appeared in 1909, over the name of the then Secretary of State, Lord Morley, (in a "Memorandum on the Results of Indian Administration during last Fifty years") in which it was stated that "with the improvement in education has come a much higher standard of probity and sense of duty, and there has been great improvement in character and attainments in the public services."

These high official testimonials are conclusive on the point that the results of University education have been conducive to the growth and development of a higher standard of thought and action amongst our educated classes. It goes without saying that its effect on the much larger number of Indians, who have chosen to work in the numerous walks of life, outside the ranks of the public services—in the professions, and in trade and commerce—has been equally beneficial and wholesome. Further, it has brought about that great intellectual ferment which is known as the "Indian Renaissance", but which our unsympathetic critics prefer to call the "Indian Unrest." Lord Morley himself described this great upheaval as "a living movement in the mind of the Indian people for objects which we ourselves have taught them to think desirable."

Later, a distinguished Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab spoke of this "living movement" as follows:—"What is happening in India is not a phase but a new birth, and the proof of it lies in its universal acceptance by all classes of people in that country. This interesting movement is due to a strong desire to rise higher in the scale of nations. 'Why should we lag behind,' is the voice of India from Peshawar to Cape Comorin. And so a new life is new born in India with new thoughts, new aspirations, new standards, new ideals and conceptions of society." The Metropolitan of India, at the time, sketched out the new movement in terms which, I am sure, will appeal to you all:—"One feature of it," he said, "is apparent in educated India—there is life where there was stagnation. The spiritual nature of the Indian thinkers and writers is elevated at the prospect of an awakening East, an 'Indian nation', and a free and an enlightened people. Educated India is tingling with a new life, and though the form taken may be at times crude and even repellent, it is nonetheless life, life, life." It would be easy to multiply equally eloquent declarations, but the latest testimony to the work of our Universities which I may fittingly quote, is that of Lord Lothian, the Chairman of the Indian Franchise Committee.

The Marquess of Lothian, speaking on the India Bill in the House of Lords, said:—"The Indian Universities are teaching the whole mass of Western education, and instructing their students in British constitutional history. They have in them a hundred thousand students, more than twice as many students as are in all the Universities of this country, and practically every one of them is a young nationalist, one and all wanting India to assume the responsibility for its own government." He then went on to ask: "Who are going to be the leaders of India to-morrow?" and he thus answered the question:—"The editors of the newspapers, who are going to be drawn from these students. The people who are going to be elected to the legislature are the people, in large measure, who have had this kind of education. It is the University students who will also find their way into the Civil Service. The leaders of the great Indian Bar will be the products of the Indian Universities. Again, Indian business is being increasingly manned by people who have had a University education. The India which is going to be led by these hundred thousand students, mostly nationalist, will be an entirely different India from that which we have read about in history."

Surely, you could not have more generous appreciations of your work and worth than those embodied in the eloquent passages I have read out to you. It is thus clear that while, like all human institutions, our higher educational system is not perfect, yet it has already rendered good and great service to the cause of Indian progress. I maintain that much of the denunciation of it—even when it is not interested —is wholly unwarranted, if not irresponsible, as evidenced by the declarations I have quoted from eminent authorities. We may thus safely adopt, and adapt to our purpose, the language of John Morley, (in his famous essay on Compromise), that if "every age is in some sort an age of transition, our own is characteristically and cardinally an epoch of transition in the very foundations of belief and conduct." That such a momentous epoch in transition, such mental upheaval and intellectual ferment, should be inevitably accompanied by occasional extravagance, or impatience, on the part of some young people, is not at all surprising. But I assert that the great Indian Renaissance, which is changing, with an almost kaleidoscopic rapidity the perspective, outlook and standpoint of the educated Indians, is a stern reality, which has got to be reckoned with by all concerned.

I need scarcely tell you that my object, in drawing your attention to these authoritative testimonies to the almost phenomenal success of higher education in this country, is that as educated persons you should always bear in mind your great responsibilities in all that you say and do. You cannot, therefore, be too careful not to play into the hands of your captious critics, and I hope that in all your activities you will steadily keep your great responsibilities in mind, so as not to give them a chance to hold up your class, and the system of higher education itself, to opprobrium.

PROBLEMS OF EDUCATION IN INDIA. *

Without in any degree underestimating the value in our national life of cultural pursuits or without intending to cast the slightest slur upon our universities, I am anxious that the whole problem of education should now be viewed from a different angle. To put it briefly my submission is that the problem of education must now be viewed along with and as connected with the problem of employment. This does not, by any means, mean or imply that we must close our universities or curtail their activities. It does, however, imply that we shall so readjust our entire system of education as to afford, on the one hand, every possible opportunity to those of our boys for receiving university education in arts or sciences who are likely to benefit by it and it also implies that we shall not allow wastage of intellect and opportunity in the case of those who are not likely to benefit at all by academic education at universities or other higher seats of learning. For the latter class we must provide suitable education, vocational or industrial or some other kind, which may enable them to acquire the faculty of doing things at an early stage of their life and earn a decent living. We must give a new bias to education in its early stages.

It seems to me that essence of the whole problem lies in reforming education at the bottom, i. e., in reorganizing (1) our primary education so as to bring it more into harmony with rural conditions and (2) secondary education so as to make it self-sufficient and not subservient, as it is at present, merely to university education. It must mark, in my opinion, a definite stage in the career of a boy so that if he wishes to start in any career, for which he has received the proper training he should be able to do so at the end of his secondary education. No doubt we shall have to provide a suitable kind of secondary education for those who propose to join universities either merely for cultural purpose or to qualify themselves for certain higher branches of public services or certain learned professions. It is only thus that in my humble judgment you can secure on the one hand the true interests of culture and on the other the material interests of a large number of our boys. At the present moment I fear the progress of the really intellectual and culturally-minded boys is impeded by their being associated at the universities with others who act as a drag on their progress. It is only when you have made some suitable provision for the latter class of boys that you will enable the former to render that service to knowledge and culture which will enable India to claim a position of honourable equality among those nations of the world which are making daily contributions to the development of science, philosophy and culture. Further, this will also permit universities to raise their standards still higher. At the present moment I am afraid we talk somewhat loosely of higher education in connection with our universities. It is true that we produce every year men who achieve distinction at certain competitive examinations both in India and in England, it is also true that these men have raised the level of public conduct in our services, nor do I forget that some of these men who join learned professions achieve distinction, but when I think of universities as they are at present I do not think of the limited number of good men they produce but of the very large number of, I shall not say second class but, third class men with very indifferent intellectual equipment, with scarcely developed cultural tastes and with no clear ideas about many things. At the present moment I am afraid it is only too true to say of a large number of our young men—and I say so with profuse apologies to those of my friends who are always insistent upon the claims of culture at the universities—that a university degree is sought after merely as a passport for Government jobs and not out of unadulterated love for knowledge and culture. In the interest of the universities themselves I am anxious that they should be rescued from this degrading influence. Once you have done that there will not be that mass production of graduates which brings no credit to the universities on their cultural side but which is making life more and more difficult for those unfortunate victims of a system which may do good to some but which does, in my humble opinion, no good to the vast majority. My conviction is that we cannot allow to tinker with this problem and leave things to drift for themselves. We must have a definite policy with regard not merely to university education but also with regard to educational institutions at the bottom. I am old enough to remember the bitter and long drawn out controversy which arose out of Lord Curzon's attempt to reform university education. Thirty years later when the whole subject of education has passed into our hands and will pass in still greater abundance under the new constitution, it is possible for us to express a regret that Lord Curzon's great intellect and driving force were not directed at that time towards reforming secondary education or giving a proper start to primary education. If that had been done it seems to me that much of the acuteness of the evils of the present system might have been prevented in good time. But now that we are going to be responsible for educating our own people I think there is no reason why we should not approach the whole problem boldly and courageously with definite and clear ideas as to the future. I am anxious to prevent misunderstandings.

As I have said before I do not wish to discourage university education or curtail the beneficent activities of our universities. I would much rather concentrate for the next few years on a reorganization of our school education. As regards the universities themselves I suggest that the time has come when each university—and it must be remembered that our resources are not so ample as those of western countries—should select for itself certain subjects of study on which it would lay special emphasis so that special value might attach to its alumni in those subjects. I am afraid as a layman I have no business to go further into this matter, but perhaps you will permit me to say that in the earlier stages of our boys' education I would much rather that their power of observation was developed, that their general knowledge of things around them and beyond them was of a higher character than that their mind should be fed merely on certain text-books and that we should continue to attach so much artificial value to examinations and the result of examinations.

One danger that I foresee under the new constitution is that education being a provincial subject our universities and our entire educational system in each province may tend from a national point of view to become far too provincial or parochial. I sincerely hope and trust that without in the slightest degree interfering with the autonomy of the provinces it may be possible to devise some machinery for the interchange of ideas between province and province and to secure some co-ordination and prevent unhealthy competition.

TAJ BAHADUR SAPRU.

THE TURKISH CONSTITUTION.*

The Turkish constitution is exceedingly democratic. The sole lawful representative of the nation is the Grand National Assembly, which is elected by all citizens over eighteen. Men and women over thirty are eligible for election, but an exception is made in the case of army officers—a provision designed to prevent a military group from dominating the Assembly. The Assembly exercises the legislative power directly, while its executive authority is represented by the President of the Republic, whom it elects every four years. The President appoints the Prime Minister, who in turn chooses the cabinet from among the members of the Assembly. The President has only a suspensive veto, which does not apply, however, to constitutional amendments or budget legislation. Other articles of the constitution recognise the rights of private property, while its whole tenor reveals its contrast with neighbouring Bolshevik ideals. In principle, the sovereignty of the National Assembly is thus a constitutional fact.

In practice, however, Turkey has a dictatorial form of government resembling in many ways the Fascist regime in Italy. It operates through the People's Party, whose outstanding political principle is a one-party system with aggressive leadership. The fact that the army is obedient and loyal to Kamal Ataturk, President of the Republic and leader of the party, enforces dictatorial rule, although many observers hold that Ataturk himself desires to secure the eventual functioning of democratic institutions. The People's Party evolved from the Association for the Defense of the Rights of Anatolia and Roumelia, a political organisation whose guiding ideals of defense of Turkey against imperialistic aggression, abolition of the despotic Sultanate, and establishment of a national, homogeneous state were incorporated in the National Pact. Founded in August 1923, the People's Party officially became "the Republican Party of the People" in 1924, and remains the only political party in Turkey today. Ataturk's attempts in 1925 and again in 1930 to form an opposition party for the purpose of promoting healthy criticism and furthering the political education of the people along true democratic lines, proved abortive because the political training of the people was not sufficiently advanced for representative government. The political history of the last twelve years has been one of liberal moves, subsequent abuse of the new liberties, followed by a return to a form of "benevolent despotism." At present, Atatürk has a firm grip on the helm and permits no opposition to the course he has charted.

Atatürk directs the People's Party not only by means of his control over the army, but also by his personal popularity among the people. The party's programme and the deputies nominated for the Grand National Assembly must have his approval. Almost all government officials and influential men and women are party members, and since all legislation is initiated and voted upon in caucus of the party, the Assembly becomes merely a debating body. Congresses are held every four years, at which time future policies are determined. In addition to Kamal Atatürk, three other men exert influence within the party: General Ismet Inönü, the Prime Minister; General Kazim Özalp, former president of the Assembly but present Minister of National Defense; and Recep Peker, secretary-general of the party.

ZENANA MISSION WORK IN INDIA.

The announcement was made that negotiations had reached practically a final stage for the amalgamation of two great humanitarian bodies the Church of England Zenana Missionary Society and the Zenana Bible and Medical Mission. If the scheme goes through the latter Society will be absorbed in the former, which will retain its present constitution intact.

The Church of England Zenana Missionary Society has now been established in India as an individual body for over 55 years. Actually, however, it owes its existence to the founding in 1852 of the Calcutta Normal School for the training of teachers, out of which the "Indian Female Normal School and Instruction Society" was evolved. Its aim was "to reach every woman in India," and it was interdenominational in character.

The Church of England Zenana Missionary Society today conducts 149 Primary, Middle and High Schools with 14,200 pupils, and four normal schools with 60 pupils. It has 8 special schools for the deaf and 3 for the blind with over 650 pupils in them; 10 industrial schools and 12 orphanages with over 300 children. In addition, there are 11,800 Zenana pupils. Six of these schools are boarding establishments. The High Schools, largely used by non-Christian girls, are at Madras, Peshawar and Bhagalpur.

The Society has all along paid particular attention to the medical field and now possesses 21 hospitals and 30 dispensaries, with 11 qualified medical women, 17 Indian medical assistants, 19 nursing sisters and 264 other medical workers.

The Zenana Bible and Medical Mission, which was also founded in 1852, works solely amongst women and children in India. It has 32 schools with 8,483 scholars; 8 women's hospitals and 8 dispensaries, with 204 beds, over 5,000 in-patients and 28,000 out-patients. The attendance at hospitals and dispensaries numbered 96,000 last year.

It also conducts training institutions for orphans; girls, converts and the blind; and Homes for babies. Owing to financial considerations, considerable reductions had to be made both in salaries of Indian and English workers and in grants to the stations.

It is understood that the scheme of amalgamation now awaits the approval of the Charity Commissioners, after which a meeting will be held, and the amalgamation carried out if approved finally by the Church of England Zenana Missionary Society. —Times of India.

NOTES

Training for Social Service:—Some days ago we received the prospectus of a scheme formulated by the Karnataka Sahitya Parishat of Bangalore for village work by graduates. Recently His Highness the Yuvaraj of Mysore, who is President of the Parishat, commended the Itinerant Lectures Scheme, as it is called, to public support in the State. Eight young men are to be selected, in the first instance, and given a stipend of about Rs. 30 a month to visit villages, and to instruct the people in rural sanitation, personal and domestic hygiene, civic responsibility, history of the State and India, elements of science and economics, social questions such as the position of women, child marriages and the harijans, and also topics of wider interest like the League of Nations' activities. The lectures are to be combined with readings and recitations from the Indian classics and interspersed with musical entertainments. In fact, the old institution of religious bards is to be remodelled to suit present-day conditions. The scheme is well conceived but its success will depend wholly on the selection of the right type of men. A more ambitious scheme for training social workers is represented by the Sir Dorabji Tata School of Social Work, Bombay, the first bulletin of which is before us. Dr. Clifford Manshardt, whose work at Nagpada Neighbourhood House is well-known, is Director and Professor of Social Economy. With him are associated Dr. J. M. Kumarappa and Dr. T. Altman of Munich as Professor and Instructor in Sociology. Professor Arthur E. Holt of Chicago University will be Visiting Professor for the academic year, 1936-37. The course will be for two years and only graduates of recognised universities will be admitted. Intending students are warned that being a graduate in itself is not sufficient qualification; they should have a keen interest in and adaptability for social work. The School is open to both men and women. Ten scholarships of the annual value of Rs. 250 each will be available for deserving students. The course covers all main and subsidiary subjects likely to be useful to the social worker. We welcome this pioneer institution. Two observations occur to us. Social work of the American type is highly specialised. A reader kindly sent us a few days ago a Report by Dr. Stuart Carter Dodd, entitled "A Controlled Experiment on Rural Hygiene in Syria" published by the University of Beirut. We were struck by the thoroughness and intensity with which every detail was worked out but we also felt that there was too much tendency to standardise. Now, standardising is an excellent thing; it facilitates regularity and the production and supply of "spare parts" but the human touch so essential in social work is apt to fall into the background in the process. We recently quoted from the New Republic how trained social workers, when taken on the Relief Administration, failed to make good as executives. The experience of Dr. Manshardt and Dr. Kumarappa will, we are sure, take care that the training in the school gives full scope for the development of sympathy for the objects of social service. The social worker must start with the assumption that the established social institutions fulfil some useful purpose and, as far as possible, his endeavour should be to utilise them in working for improvement. This we think, will be the most difficult part of the training in the School. But if the trained worker starts with the idea that the people's beliefs are all superstitions and the old customs all absurd, he will be able to accomplish much less than he can with an open mind.

Bhopal's Convocation Address:—The Nawab of Bhopal speaking at the Annual Convocation of Allahabad University referred to the junction between the Jumna and the Ganges as symbolical of the confluence between Hindu and Islamic culture. But there is a third, though hidden, stream which lends sanctity to Prayag—the Sarasvati. Even so our modern educational problem involves three, not two, factors. The third is European culture, which will not be left out. The fusion of cultures in our Universities, can not be accomplished except through the medium of modern culture. The point is important. The failure to recognise it vitiates many schemes of Indian progress. For instance, the position which the English language has attained as a lingua franca is not, when this third factor in Indian evolution is taken into account, in the least derogatory to Indian nationalism. English today is not a foreign language. It is the second language which educated men and women use in political and civil life. No Indian language was found suitable for the purpose. The idea of political and civil freedom was almost alien to them all. English has been the great emancipating influence in Indian life and we do not see anything strange in our using that language in our intercourse with people of other linguistic areas and the world outside. It is obvious even to casual observers that the measure of freedom and the appreciation of it is larger in areas where the knowledge of English is more extended than elsewhere. The difference is especially marked in the position of women in social and public life. It is to the spirit of freedom learnt through the English language and literature that we owe our reform movements. English is not the exclusive property of the Great Britain. There are at least three nations which speak it as their mother tongue outside the British Isles. One of them is now Britain's equal in sea power and her superior in money power. The Asiatic nations with which India has most affinities have made the study of English compulsory in their schools. India's position in international life is alongside of the English-speaking nations. The movement to discard English is a retrograde movement from the national point of view and it has already caused much confusion of thought and deviations from the straight line of national progress.

The Italo-Ethiopian War.—The League of Nations, through its Committees of five and eighteen, has been laboriously working out the details of the sanctions which it has agreed to apply to Italy as the aggressor in the present war. During all this time, France and England have been pursuing a parallel course of devising a settlement which, if accepted by the League, Signor Mussolini and the Ethiopian Emperor would end the war. The two Governments have made out a plan, which is satisfactory to themselves, and have sent it to Rome and Addis Ababa. At the time of writing, it is announced that Ethiopian Emperor has definitely rejected it. He has declared that under no circumstances would he cede any territory to Italy which the League of Nations had declared to be the aggressor and he can not believe that the League would accept it either. News from Geneva is to the effect that the smaller nations are taken aback by Britain and France making proposals of settlement so wholly opposed to the position the League had adopted towards Italy with their concurrence and under their guidance. If, as is stated, Signor Mussolini agree to the Franco-British proposals, even if the League disapproves of them, Britain and France will have to decline to take further part in the application of sanctions and may even support Italy in enforcing compliance with their scheme of settlement.

This can only be regarded as the betrayal of Ethiopia after having led her on to believe that the League was going to stand by her. We trust that the Indian delegation to the League of Nations would make it clear that India does not approve of the settlement involving cession of territory to Italy and the acceptance by Ethiopia of the position of a vassal state in relation to her violator. But whether the Indian delegation is free to do so or not, Indian public opinion must express itself in a way which can not be mistaken, that it totally disapproves of this inequitable and odious treatment of Ethiopia.

The Egyptian Crisis.—Writing in the Reformer (November 23) on the trouble in Egypt, we observed that the anti-British demonstrations at that time were not portended by previous information of the causes leading to them. Since then the reason has become plain. The late Secretary of State for India, Sir Samuel Hoare who is now British Foreign Secretary, is obsessed by the idea that he has simply to give orders and the world has to obey. We in India have not forgotten his insolent declaration, 'the dogs bark but the caravan goes on.' In the same spirit he went out of his way at a speech at the Lord Mayor's Banquet in London to declare that he would devise a new constitution for Egypt on the lines, we presume, of his Government of India Act, as the Constitution of 1923 which remained suspended was not satisfactory. This roused political minded Egypt to indignation. The so-called students' demonstrations reported by Reuter were really the expression of Egyptian indignation. The Italo-Abyssinian War had actually brought Egyptian sentiment nearer to the British but the Foreign Secretary's indiscretion effectively dissipated the growing friendliness. In the House of Commons Sir Samuel tried to wriggle out of his false step but refused to withdraw his declaration. He has since, it is announced, gone for a rest in Switzerland on medical advice but he declared to an interviewer that he was looking forward to skating there. Skating may be a cure for some obscure ailment but it seems rather a strenuous one. The latest news is that the Egyptian political parties have united in petitioning King. Fuad to restore the 1923 constitution, his ministers have resigned, His Majesty has granted the demand, and the Residency has informed Nesshim Pasha that the British Government does not object to the restoration of the 1923 Constitution.

Open Door for Women.—We published some time back in the Reformer (September 7 and 14), the text of Miss Chrystal Macmillan's presidential address to the fourth conference of the Open Door International for the economic emancipation of the woman worker, held at Copenhagen in August. The proceedings of the Conference have now been published in pamphlet form and can be had for a shilling from its offices in London. It is significant that the very first resolution of the Conference stresses the urgency of solidarity between marom ried and single women while reiterating the demand that the woman worker shall have the same right as a man to enter into paid work. The world crisis has compelled the International to protest strongly against a tendency to solve unemployment among men by increasing unemployment among women and to urge improvement in the employment situation for workers of both sexes alike. The Conference asks not only for "equal pay for equal work" but also for equal opportunities for equal work. It opposes policies fixing a minimum wage for women only. In its programme the Conference has to face the opposition of Geneva which has put through many international agreements securing special privileges to women workers and therefore imposing greater liability on their employers. The Open Door objects even to schemes for benefits to women during childbirth which compel them not to work for six weeks after confinement. "Public authorities," declares a resolution, "which provide assistance during the incapacity of the mother as, for example, money, doctors, midwives, creches, help both the mother and the father to carry out their responsibilities. They are relieving both parents." The Conference points out with some justice that direct restrictions on a woman working during the period following childbirth will deprive her of her earnings, or drive her to take up other work less remunerative and more fatiguing than her usual work; while indirect restrictions in the shape of burdens on the employer bring on a lower scale of wages for women or result in their not being employed or in their dismissal as soon as they show signs of pregnancy. The Open Door therefore demands that the woman worker who is incapacitated from her work by reason of pregnancy or confinement should be "assimilated in law to that of any worker who is incapacitated for his usual work on account of accident or illness." The ideals of the Open Door are worth serious study specially by leaders of the women's movement in India who are apt to think in conventional terms. Their emphasis on equal protection for men and women is certain to achieve better conditions for men workers.

Maharashtra Untouchable Castes:—Mr. M. G. Bhagat has published a summary of the results of an investigation into the social and economic condition of the untouchable castes of Maharashtra. Of the material collected in the ten districts of Maharashtra, that pertaining to four is left out of the purview of the present study. There are five main castes regarded as untouchables in Maharashtra, namely, Mahars, Chamars, Mangs, Bhors and Bhangis. The last named are not a Maharashtra caste but immigrants from Upper India. Of the 542 families whose circumstances are set forth in this essay, the large majority were Mahars. Marriage is universal among these castes and the heavy expenditure on marriage festivities is said to account for much of their indebtedness. The statistics of births and deaths compiled by the author show that these castes are neither worse nor better off than the caste Hindu masses in respect of health conditions. Agriculture is their chief occupation but very few of these castes own lands and Mr. Bhagat makes out that cultivation is not a very profitable occupation to them. Except one family of Bhors whose income is said to be one thousand a month, the average monthly income of the members is less than Rs. 15. The Bhors and Bhangis have the largest incomes owing to steadier occupation. Maharashtra has little grass land and cattle breeding is not paying. Besides, caste Hindus will not buy milk from untouchables and the latter will not buy it from each other. They do not generally keep cows for this reason. Mr. Bhagat records the existence of a custom. The small female calf is given to anybody to be brought up and after it is fully grown into a cow it is to be returned to the owner after taking its first issue. "Thus," he adds, "it becomes convenient for them to have bullocks for agricultural purposes which is their main point in view." The joint family system prevails among these castes also. Another custom which Mr. Bhagat records is that of members of these classes having to serve in the homes of sowcars from whom they borrowed, for a number of years. A Mahar boy of village, Baldapur, got married last year at the age of 15, and borrowed Rs. 100 from a local Muslim sowcar for the purpose. "He has to serve for a period of seven years as a domestic servant in that Sowcar's house and after that period he will be free. During the service, he is to get food and a fixed number of clothes and a pair of sandals." This practice is common in all the Maharashtra districts.

Jesuitical Reasoning:—The Catholic Examiner insinuates in a recent issue that the case of Shantidevi, the nine-year old girl who 'remembered' her past life, was a story specially concocted for the purpose of keeping Dr. Ambedkar within the Hindu fold. It writes, "Is it only a coincidence that while Dr. Ambedkar is advising Harijans to give up the religious principles (Karma and reincarnation), which lead to their ill-treatment, a great deal of publicity is being given to a nine-year old girl at Delhi who 'has been telling facts about her previous life?' About 15,000 persons, we are told, were present at a public meeting to see and hear this child, and various Hindu leaders 'explained that the case was genuine.' The outsider can only remark that it supplies a very opportune retort to Dr. Ambedkar's challenge." Dr. Ambedkar has made it perfectly clear that he is changing his religion not for benefits in the next world but for securing justice and fair-play to the Depressed Classes. The perversion of his statements of the doctrine of reincarnation is just that it might link up his agitation to the Delhi incident is typical of a logic which has earned world-reputation as Jesuitical. realpatidar.com

[Dec. 14

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

BOMBAY, December 14, 1935.

MR. JAYAKAR ON UNIVERSITY EDUCATION.

Among the Convocation addresses delivered during the last few days, that delivered by Mr. M. R. Jayakar at Nagpur University easily takes high place. It is a careful and illuminating analysis of the conditions of education in India. At the very outset Mr. Jayakar points out, what our educational advisers often ignore, that education is a function of society, its most important function. There is no duty more important than what one generation owes to its successor, to train it in the way it should go in order to preserve what is good in the past and help the present and the future to be better than the past. In normal conditions the State as the organ of Society discharges this function. But in Indian conditions, it is almost wholly taken out of the purview of Society. Mr. Jayakar said that he was aware that educational reform was largely connected with the high policy of the State, but he was not without hope that, under the future constitution, Government will function more than it does as the organ of society in effecting beneficent changes in University education. Many others are not so sanguine but everybody would be pleased if the unexpected happens. Mr. Jayakar spoke of Universities getting into closer touch with Government. But they are now largely controlled by Government and, obviously, the touch which he meant was one arising out of the State's closer union with Society. Control of Universities by a Government standing outside society is, under the best of conditions, harmful to the cause of education. The discontinuity between the State and Society in India, is the greatest obstacle to national growth. We must add, however, that English education, to use the conventional phrase, was the most disinterested gift of Britain to India. The idea of making education subservient to political considerations was a later development. The original idea was to lead India to national freedom. The story has often been told of Briggs' finding Elphinstone in his tent poring over some readers intended for primary schools. "I asked him what they were meant for," wrote Briggs. "To educate natives," said he, "but it is our high road back to Europe." "Then," I replied, "I wonder you, as Governor of Bombay, have set it on foot." He answered, "We are bound under all circumstances, to do our duty to them." If the Universities were originally intended to produce subordinate officials, they certainly belied it in many cases. Gurudas Banerjee, Asutosh Mukherji, Dadabhai Naoroji, Ranade, Bhandarkar, Pherozeshah Mehta, Sir T. Madhav Rao, Ranga Charlu, Seshadri Iyer, were not trained quill-drivers and they were all products of Indian Universities. Gokhale knew what he was about when he fiercely resisted interference with University education as laying unholy hands on the Ark of the Covenant. The deliberate depreciation of education insidiously began with the first appearance of political consciousness among Indians. By subtle propaganda some Indians themselves began to talk in the language of the propagandists and the cry came to be taken over by the Nationalists who hated everything which was foreign, merely because they were foreign.

The whole trouble with our education now is that large numbers of students outside the old castes with a literary tradition, have in the natural course, sought its benefits. This is a thing which should be welcomed but it has frightened the authorities. They want to control admissions and regulate the entrance of students from one stage to another. Already in some parts of the country, admission to colleges is made on a quota basis—so much per cent for this or that sect or caste. This plan is apparently to be extended within the groups themselves. Every one recognises that there is not enough variety in the courses offered in our education system. Mr. Jayakar's suggestion of "landing places" at different points where those who are unable or disinclined to keep on, can step aside, has the merit of avoiding arbitrary action by some authority. There will be so many sidings to the main line. No objection can be urged against it, except that America, where it comes from, is the land of opportunities while India is of the lack of them. An American boy with only his natural talents can aspire to the highest positions in any walk of life. In India, unless we open up the avenues of opportunity far more widely, young men may find themselves stranded on the sidings instead of on the main line. We come round to the main theme: Education is the most important function of Society. The State is the organ of Society for the discharge of its functions. We must get Society and State in India in line in order that the educational function may be adequately performed. Mr. Jayakar avoided the mistake, too common nowadays, of confusing the issue of unemployment with issues relating to education. In every country in the world, including those whose educational systems are free from the defects of our system, there is unemployment, indeed in some cases more distressing than among educated Indians. It has come to be acknowledged that unemployment is the result of an economic system of which the dominant motive is private profit and public well-being only to the extent that it subserves on private profit and that the true remedy is to alter the system so as to make public interests the first consideration. It is not Bolsheviks only who hold this view. To declare that education must be made to lead to employment is, in the present circumstances, to declare that education must be made subordinate to a discredited system which, every thinking man recognises, must be radically changed if civilization is to endure. We are glad, therefore, that Mr. Jayakar wisely refrained from joining in the cry of radical educational reform as a cure for unemployment. In another respect, too, his address is remarkable for its deeper insight. Some of our leaders are prone to seek light on our problems from the wholly dissimilar conditions elsewhere. Mr. Jayakar bade his hearers first to turn to their own ancient lights for guidance. There is no sensational statement in the address but the whole of it is permeated by the earnest desire to help the new graduates to think clearly and act calmly in all situations which may confront them in life.

real1935.com

Mr. Jayakar's suggestion to Nagpur University to create a Faculty of Indian Culture, is a great constructive suggestion. There are, as he said, many points of affinity between the culture and the literature of the several communities inhabiting India. The social and family life throughout the land is moulded on the same broad lines. Where there are differences they are understood and respected. Forces, however, are at work to magnify differences and to deny the existence of a common culture and civilisation distinctive to India. No agency is so well fitted to counteract this mischief as Universities. Among Indian Universities that at Nagpur is especially marked out as the most favoured for the institution of a Faculty of Indian Culture. It occupies a central position, midway between Aryan and Dravidian India, the two basic factors of Indian culture. It has for neighbour the great Indian State in which Indian nationalism is being shaped under enlightened Muslim auspices. The statutory disruption of British India by the new Government of India Act, unless the best minds of the country bend all their energies to provide a substitute for the bond hitherto provided by a unitary form of Government, will go far to undo not only the administrative unity of British India but the ancient cultural unity of the land between the Himalayas and the three seas. In passing, we must express regret that some critics have dealt with this important suggestion in a spirit of offensive levity. There are people whom the word 'culture' throws into fits. But the unity of India which has made her civilisation endure and which will make it endure is cultural and religious. This is a bond which is stronger than that created by political or even economic forces.

Verrier Elwin:— The Dnyanodaya, Poona shares with its readers the following letter from Verrier Elwin dated Karanja, Mandla District, Dec. 2: I have just been shocked beyond measure by a report that I am no longer a Christian. It is perfectly true that I have left the Church of England which had denied me her fellowship for several years, but I have never heard before that Anglicanism is synonymous with Christianity. My opinions are not of the least importance, but such an accusation against any servant of Christ ought not to pass unchallenged, and I would be infinitely obliged if you could find a corner in your paper to contradict. Of course, I have never dreamt of ceasing to be a Christian, Christ has for me the one solution of the problems that vex our world.

BIRTH CONTROL AND EUGENICS.

Birth Control being a means and not an end, it affects population to a very negligible extent, if at all. The birth-rate itself is nothing more than an index to the trend of community feeling. Nothing except perhaps State aid to large families can raise the birth-rate, for example, in communities which require a long period to equip the younger generation for earning its livelihood. Nothing can lower it among peoples whose children start earning early in life unless it be legislation against the employment of juveniles, or their promotion through prosperity to the first group. The only connection that can be traced between Birth Control and the birth-rate seems to be that the demand for contraceptives is likely to be greater in a community which has a low birth-rate than in a group which has a high one, provided, of course, the State does not intervene. But this deduction is more useful to the tradesman than to the sociologist. The argument that Birth Control practice will, if generally adopted, be a potent factor in checking war, arises from the population fallacy. But modern wars are waged mostly for markets for surplus products which cannot be consumed by the population at home. Unemployment itself in the present age of plenty is largely the result of the failure of consumption to keep pace with production. The reality of the Italian contention that her aggression on Abyssinia is brought on by the necessity for colonial possession to settle her surplus population on, can best be measured by a study of Italian Eritrea where very little colonising has taken place.

Closely allied to what may be called the 'quantity' argument of birth-controllists, is the eugenic, or 'quality', argument. The main thesis here is that if you have fewer children they will be better children. Apart from the fact that there seems no reason why this should be so, birth control by its very nature would encourage restriction of families among the very types we should all like to see increase while it will fail to influence the thriftless and the improvident. Further, as the provident would have practised self-control in the absence of the new knowledge, the tendency would arise to eliminate from the private life of future generations a much-valued quality. Then again, while most of us know what traits we should like in our posterity, no method has been so far discovered which ensures the dependability of heredity. A miserly parent usually has a spendthrift son and the son of a spendthrift has perforce to exercise the virtues of economy and care. Even the intellectuals fail to reproduce themselves with a moderate measure of certainty. And the stories so often narrated by leaders in business and public life, of their triumphs over early poverty, encourage one to demand an increase in the poorer classes. We can never suffer from a scarcity of the intellectuals because their growth is not confined to any particular class. Under the present profits system, there will always be the rich. As a class the rich are in more serious danger of losing numerically through the greater and greater concentration of money in the hands of a few than from any wide adoption of birth control. "The loss of a hundred and thirty thousand of the best, reputed individuals in the State," wrote Saint-Simon, "would certainly distress the French for they are a kindly-disposed nation. But the catastrophe would occasion sorrow of a purely sentimental kind. It would not cause the community the least inconvenience." But should a leader arise among the labouring classes and influence them toward a lower birth-rate, civilisation would be at an end. The world has more to dread from scarcity in the lower classes than in the rich and intellectual groups. The biological analogy fails because, firstly, it overlooks the difference between physical and mental qualities, and, secondly, it assumes wrongly that among animals breeding has been developed with mathematical certainty. The influence of environment is far greater than heredity on the individual as is being increasingly recognised today. Where an argument can be made out, for mentally and physically defective individuals for instance, the sterilisation expert has overpowered the birth-controllists many of whom have gone so far as to advocate sterilisation as a "birth control measure" for such cases. From the eugenic point of view, it does not really matter, therefore, whether a community practices birth control or not.

On the religious issue also, there is nothing to be said either for the birth controllist or his opponent. The religious objection is voiced chiefly, almost exclusively, by the Roman Catholic clergy. It is surprising that, whilst we are told on Prohibition by these religious leaders that there is nothing intrinsically wrong in alcohol, the evil being its misuse, on contraceptives a more rigorous standard is applied. But the discussion is mainly academic and has a limited interest. Closely interwoven with the religious issue is the moral one on which again too much is claimed by both sides. Whilst birth controllists regard changes in the status of women in Western Europe during the last fifty years as fruits of their work, the anti-contraceptionists cite the fall in illegitimate births as proving their contention that instruction in contraceptive use has not been restricted to the married. The reason why Mrs. Sanger asserted with confidence at a Bombay meeting that morals have improved in modern Europe in the last fifty years was probably that by 'morality' she meant something different to what was conventionally understood. But she did not trouble to explain her viewpoint. It is not unlikely that morals in the West are higher today than they were fifty years ago. In fact, Mr. Bertrand Russell wrote in the New Statesman that Europe had improved since the days of his grand-parents. That there is still room for improvement—and how bad England must have been fifty years ago if she is better today—is shown by a letter in a later issue of the same journal. We extract the following, "There seems to me to be a large number of my contemporaries who have read some book or other on birth control and feel that something must be done about it, but who lack any sex ethic to guide them. Although unwilling to run the still existing though greatly diminished risk of actual intercourse, they consider all forms of "petting" as an essential part of adult life and, indeed, as the obvious way of spending their evenings and week-ends. I cannot help thinking that this section of my generation will be old and cynical before they are thirty and when they most need the full force and energy of youthful vitality and humour to deal with the problems of the upbringing of children. Even now their restlessness and their thirst for speed, thrill, anything with a "kick" in it, show their inability to appreciate the more static pleasures of life, and their conversation, nervously sex-haunted, betrays their fear that they are missing something." It would, however, be rash to conclude from this that the morals of modern Europe and America, whether one considers them better than in the past or worse, are influenced to any appreciable extent by birth control propaganda. Morally the Western world has grown out of an age of repression into one of exhibitionism. But neither praise nor blame can be apportioned to the birth control movement for the transition. Mrs. Sanger herself has realised the truth of this since her Bombay address. For replying at a Calcutta meeting to a question from Mr. Krishna Kumar Mitra, the veteran Brahma leader, whether uncontrolled sexual indulgence would not result from acceptance of her advice, she said that if people "took it in a good way, they would find spiritual happiness and religion but if it was taken in a bad light they would all have evil of it." This seems to indicate a change from her earlier attitude (Sex in Civilisation, page 525) that the "birth control movement is an active and contributing factor and not a mere passive accompaniment of progress."

THE EMIGRANT RUSSIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH.*

The Emigrant Russian Orthodox Church is at present divided into two rival tendencies, but is on the way to reaching amicable reconciliation.

The first of these trends is led by the Archbishop Metropolitan Antonii, who belongs to the Synod of Karlovtsy, Yugoslavia. This trend, which is of a definitely conservative political and religious character (aiming at the restoration of an Orthodox Czar of the house of Romanoff), first made itself felt in June 1921 at Constantinople. The emigrants in question, while awaiting facilities for the resumption of relations with the Patriarch Tihon of Moscow, founded an independent Church and constituted, under the Serbian Patriarchate at Karlovtsy, a Holy Synod, at the centre of which was Archbishop Ievlogii, to whom reference will be made again later.

"Karlovtsy" bishops were established here and there, and this gave rise to juridical disputes with the local Orthodox authorities. On May 5, 1922, the Patriarch Tihon condemned the Karlovtsy Synod, because its political activity was complicating the situation of the Russian Orthodox Churches in the U. S. S. R., which were accused of having sympathetic relations with emigrant monarchists. On the other hand, since 1920 the Patriarch Tihon had appointed two Exarchs to look after the Russians abroad: Metropolitan Ievlogii in Paris and Metropolitan Platon for North America. Difficulties arose between these two prelates and the Karlovtsy Synod.

In 1926 Mgrs. Ievlogii and Platon refused to recognise the authority of the Karlovtsy Synod which, in 1927, dismissed them both and appointed administrators to govern their dioceses, Bishop Serafim in particular replacing Mgr. Ievlogii in Paris. A very small minority of priests and of the faithful recognised his authority. The Metropolitan Ievlogii and Platon declared that they held their authority from the only authentic head of the Russian Orthodox Church: the Patriarch Tihon.

When the last named died, on April 7, 1925, he was succeeded, after a short interval, by the Metropolitan Sergii of Nijni-Novgorod who, after imprisonment by the Soviet Government, had been released. An old pupil and friend of the Metropolitan Antonii, he nevertheless published, on July 29, 1927, a letter declaring that he had obtained from the Soviet authorities legal recognition for the general direction of the Church. In consequence, he denounced as clearly contrary to religious principle any action directed against the political regime of the U. S. S. R. and invited the emigrant clergy to sign a formal recognition of the Soviet Government, or be struck out of the national Church. The Karlovtsy Synod replied on May 9 with a categorical refusal. The Metropolitan Sergii announced on May 9, 1928 that the Karlovoy Synod was illegal and had no longer any right of jurisdiction. The decree remained without effect.

In the decision dated May 9, 1928, the Metropolitan Sergii relieved Archbishop Ievlogii, at his request, of the sentence of deposition pronounced against him by the Karlovoy Synod and confirmed him in the authority which had lately been bestowed upon him by the Patriarch Tihon. Mgr. Ievlogii, on account of his attitude to the Soviets, was declared "schismatic and suspended;" he was then placed under the jurisdiction of the Patriarch of Constantinople where he still is.

On June 22, 1934, the Metropolitan Sergii, in a letter to the Metropolitan Elefterii of Lithuania, the administrator whom he had appointed for the Russian Churches of Western Europe, renewed the sanctions adopted in 1928 against the hierarchy of Karlovoy. Mgr. Elefterii applied this condemnation, which the Karlovoy Synod rejected stressing that it found it impossible to be sure of legal recognition and liberty for the ecclesiastical authorities in the U. S. S. R.

According to a correspondence published in June 1934 by the Russkoie slovo, the Karlovoy Synod seems to have entered into negotiations with the Metropolitan Sergii, with a view to being placed under the jurisdiction of the Patriarch of Yugoslavia. The uncompromising attitude of the Synod seems to have been due to purely political reasons; to avoid coming under the authority of the Metropolitan Sergii and the Synod of Moscow.

Mgr. Ievlogii went to Karlovoy to make his peace with Mgr. Antonii, and on May 15, 1934, the two Metropolitans pronounced the abolition of their mutual censures; there was no common service, but the ecclesiastical difference of opinion seemed to have entered on a new phase.

In September 1934, Mgr. Ievlogii was invited to sit at the Karlovoy Synod on an equal footing with the other prelates, on condition that he abandoned the jurisdiction of the Oecumenical Patriarchate for that of the Metropolitan Sergii. Mgr. Ievlogii was ill, and unable to go to Karlovoy. On September 10, 1934 a Council met at Karlovoy and lifted the censures which had been placed in 1928, on the Metropolitan Ievlogii and his clergy. Intercommunion was thus made possible from that time on. But the jurisdiction of Archbishop Serafim in Paris was not to be contested and the conciliatory attitude of Archbishop Serafim was interpreted as repentance on his part. On September 24, 1934, Mgr. Ievlogii replied that he sincerely wished for peace; that he felt himself to be in the right and could not therefore recognise the legal position of Archbishop Serafim; but that he felt sure that administrative difficulties would be removed with time.

Mgr. Ievlogii has given particular demonstration of his oecumenical sentiments in his relations with French Protestantism. And it was he who, with a view to the training of priests "armed with all the resources of modern science...educated in the broad aspirations of oecumenism, capable of understanding the other Christian confessions", founded in Paris, in 1935, the Institute of Orthodox Theology. Since then, this institute has won a name for itself and a place of honour in Orthodoxy and in the non-Orthodox Churches. It has at present thirty students, from ten countries. It is passing through terrible financial difficulties, and the students and professors are suffering from malnutrition.

It is the Metropolitan Antonii, whose great theological authority is recognised throughout the Orthodox Church, who could now put an end to the schism. A Council is at present once more sitting at Karlovoy.

THE UNIVERSITY AND NATIONAL LIFE.

In the complexity of the daily work of the University, it is not always easy to keep in view the connection between the character of a society and the nature of its education. Yet this truth is so vital that it can never be too strongly stressed. We are apt to imagine that Colleges are something apart from the social order to which they belong and of which they are the products. In a country like India, which is rapidly changing under the pressure of social and political conditions, it is more necessary than elsewhere to remember this principle. When the older Universities were founded in India, the main need was to supply officials for Public Service, more or less in a subordinate capacity, with ambitions and initiative so regulated and controlled as to serve the main purpose in view. Macaulay's famous Minute was based upon the imperative need of creating a class of "interpreters" between Western and Eastern education. Since the days of their foundation the older Universities have been supplying this want. The time has, however, now arrived when this aim of education must be subordinated to another which will endeavour to create bolder spirits, with a more restless spirit of inquiry, wider ambitions and larger intellectual intrepidity, coupled with an increasing desire to pursue their work in obscurity and oblivion, unclouded by material ambitions, and willing to place at the disposal of the country their priceless gifts and achievements.

Indian education must accordingly adapt its methods and processes to this need. We are living in a typical age where, under the impact of modern science and industry, religious and moral beliefs, attitudes and institutions are fast giving way. The very scheme of the older life is breaking down under this onset. A large quantity of wreckage is the result, which intellectually it will be the duty of the Universities to clear up, rejecting everything not suited to modern needs and conditions. It will therefore be increasingly necessary for the Universities to regard themselves, more and more, as a large experiment room for the entire Province, where the social, intellectual, economic and industrial needs of the Province in relation to the entire country will be examined and tested and solutions found. India finds herself in an increasingly new environment, making it necessary for the Universities to undertake an intellectual planning with bold and creative insight. They must teach a new way of life suited to the needs of the hour.

It is easy to prophesy in this connection that, as we advance in the national aspiration after freedom, our Universities will have to take up the work which some of the younger Universities of America have partially achieved. For instance, the University of Wisconsin made an experiment in finding out what was best suited to the American mind in relation to the contents of study and methods of teaching, so as to determine proper conditions for the undergraduate in receiving liberal education. The end is to use these means called liberal teaching, to produce the "liberal mind," meaning thereby the creation and cultivation of the faculty called "intelligence." By that term modern educationists in that progressive country mean a Power of self-direction in the affairs of life. One author of great eminence in matters of education describes it in the following words:—"Intelligence capable of being applied in any field; ability to do what you have never done before." The attempt is to build up in the student the power of taking into his own hand the direction of his own affairs. The whole endeavour rests upon the assumption that, as against the specialized teaching of men for Banking, for scholarship, for an industry, for Art, for Medicine, for Law and the like, there is a general liberal teaching of men for "intelligence" in the conduct of their lives as human individuals. The author illustrates the meaning of "intelligence" by telling a story which recounts the difficulties and failure of Buidget, the cook, in the attempt to make good bread. Mrs. Palmer, her mistress, untrained in cooking finding her cook in difficulties, came into the kitchen and created the loaf which in that kitchen had seemed unattainable. Whereupon the author quotes with great admiration Bridget's definition of education:—"That is what education means," she said, "to be able to do what you have never done before." Bridget, it seems, saw at a glance and expressed in a word the peculiar quality of the educated, intelligent mind. That is what education means.

The primary fact in the story is that we find the meaning of the term "intelligence" as applied to teaching. Intelligence, it seems, is "readiness for any human situation. It is the power, wherever one goes, of being able to see, in any set of circumstances, the best response which a human being can make to those circumstances; and the two constituents of that power would seem to be: (1) the sense of human values, and (2) a capacity for judging situations as furnishing possibilities for the realizing of those values." The attainment of this quality would seem to be easier, were we dealing with a simple system of homogeneous intellects or studies; but with our diversity of systems, intellects and cultures in India, the problem would appear to be more difficult. The Indian system of education, taken in its broad outlines, resembles an educational ladder, commencing from the Primary School, going through the Middle and Secondary Schools and terminating in the apex of a College degree or Postgraduate studies. Millions enter, few reach the top, or even pass through the last stages. All intermediate stages are, by a great mistake, regarded as merely preparatory for the final stage and not being a preparation in themselves. Large masses of students who never expect even to approach the final stage and would, by reason of their training and environment, be incapable of taking an interest in concerns at the top, obtain no benefit from the training during the intermediate stages. Speaking of such a system of education, an American author remarks: "we must remember," he says, "that, in the main thing, people climb the first stages of the educational ladder, not with the purpose of making their way to the top, but in the expectation of finding, beside the ladder, here and there, landing places, from which they may climb by other ladders in other directions and towards quite different goals, and if these other goals and directions are not clearly seen in their relations to those of the school, then the whole scheme of teaching becomes unintelligible—a chaos of diverging and irrelevant activities."

This defect of education, which is partially inherent in all schemes where the Primary, Secondary and College stages are regarded as preparatory for the last, is more particularly operative in the Indian system, because of many political and social conditions which it is unnecessary to detail here.

No system of education can be suitable for a vast and poor country like India, with its teeming millions and varying grades of culture, with different economic and industrial needs, social conceptions and religious beliefs, unless it takes note of two requisites:—(1) the creation of many "landing places" where the student may appropriately leave the main educational ladder and climb up another in a different direction and leading to a different goal. Many such intermediate and subsidiary ladders can be imagined. They would teach skill in some limited field of activity, for instance, Commercial Arithmetic, Type-writing, Stenography, Book-keeping, Home Economics, Music, Painting, Sculpture, Agriculture, Mechanical and Electrical Engineering, Law, Medicine, etc., etc. In all these branches of activity, though in some cases the subject may be similar, as for instance in Law, Engineering and Medicine, to a higher course in post-graduate studies, the aim is to cultivate in the student the ability to ply a trade or profession and master any one of the special enterprises in which human beings engage. The endeavour is not to teach the pupil in the higher and general sense, but to develop his practical skill in the limited activity.

The second requisite is that these subsidiary ladders should not be interdependent or interconnected. Each goes its own way and attempts to prepare the student in his own special interest or vocation. The pupils being drawn into these subsidiary branches comparatively young, the teaching is not expected to be so fundamental, far-reaching or scholarly, as, for instance, that provided in the Postgraduate School for the same branch of knowledge.

Our present educational system provides few such landings and subsidiary ladders, where the student, finding himself unable to proceed up the main ladder for want of means or capacity, can leave it and take to another ladder without totally sacrificing all that he had previously learnt. Our primary aim, therefore, should be, if we wished to bring the educational system into conformity with the modern requirements of Indian life, to carefully plan out suitable landing places, to decide where they would be located in relation to the main educational ladder and to see that the instruction which the student received before he came to the landing place was so devised and arranged as to enable him to halt at the landing place and take to the other ladder, making fullest use of the instruction previously received.

If we must have the "landing places," I have described above, where the unfit and unwilling can leave off the main ladder, opportunities must be created for hundreds of persons who enter College, for seeking swift employment, first by creating new avenues of such employment and then by providing exits at which the aspirants can get out with adequate training and without sacrificing the benefits of what they had learnt. I am aware that this reform is largely connected with the high policy of the State, involving the employment of Indians in increasing proportion in many avenues where their entry is barred or discouraged at the present moment. But I am not without hope that, when Universities get more and more into touch with Governments, as I am confident will be the case under conditions to be established by the new Constitution, a united attempt will be made to relieve the pressure, in which the Government and the Universities will take their adequate share. In such a united effort alone lies the proper cure for unemployment. Neither the Government alone nor the people by themselves can ever effect a lasting solution of that problem. I am tempted to say all this to your University, because it is new and will not hesitate to adopt bold experimental measures, if they are needed, for the advancement of the people.

SIR MIRZA ISMAIL ON UNIVERSITIES.

While some eminent Indians seem to be sleepless of nights frightened by the increase in universities and graduates, the Dewan of Mysore, Sir Mirza Ismail, struck a refreshingly bold note in his speech at the Jubilee celebration of the Bangalore Central College, "India needs more universities," he said, "and ought, in course of time, to be able to maintain them. For great work has to be done in the next fifty years and the cry is for more men to do it—more educated men, men of culture, men of character and sound commonsense, men who can plan and bring to fruition the great ideal of a new, happy and united India—an India where every man is first and foremost an Indian, with common rights and responsibilities, common ideals and aspirations, making common history, without undue emphasis on caste or creed or sex or rank or whatever else it is that separates men and women from sharing a common humanity. It is a Herculean task for which education and ever more education, "in widest commonalty spread," is the one sure and basic remedy. I am not afraid of more education, of more educated men. I am not daunted by the glut of graduates on the market, by the vexed problem of unemployment. Not that I am heartless or do not sympathise with the youths who are wearing their hearts out without something to do and the parents and guardians who have given their all to see their children well established in life. But I feel that the trouble is only a passing phase and that the sky will soon brighten. There is no easy and ready-made solution, but we must all unite and attack the problem on all fronts, the Government and the general public, the individual parents and the young men themselves, whose education ought to be a strength unto them, and not a weakness, and help them to combine and organise to bring into play their grit and their spirit of enterprise, to open out new avenues, to find a way or to make it. National development in all its aspects—social, political and economic—so essential for India's freedom and the achievement of her rightful place among the nations of the world—requires that her sons and her daughters should be educated sufficiently to realise their great heritage and their no less great responsibilities to future generations. For this great work we want men—as, of course, we want work for the men we have educated. Remembering that nine-tenths of our miseries really consist in looking forward to future miseries, let us go on with full and fresh hope for the future."

THE VICEROY AND THE BYCULLA CLUB.

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

Your comments on the open letter to the Viceroy seem to imply that the chief object of Sir Chimanlal Setalvad's letter was to request Lord Willingdon to make his final speech outside an exclusive club. Reading this second letter with Sir Chimanlal's previous appeal to the Byculla Club authorities, it is clear that the admission of Indians into the Byculla, Yacht and Bombay clubs is stressed more than the Viceroy's speech.

There are Indians who have declined to become members of English clubs, even when very specially invited to do so. To such this episode is very embarrassing.

I fail to see how the Europeans can be accused of treating Indians as Pariahs, if they choose to have their clubs exclusively to themselves. They might well say that they would not force themselves into an exclusive Indian club in England.

Not all the European members of all the exclusive clubs in India will be admitted as members into all the exclusive clubs in London where there was once a proposal to start a club known as "The Leave Us Alone Club."

When the Indians boast of having lunched and dined with the King in England, why should they complain if dining in European clubs with ordinary Europeans is denied to them in India? It is unreasonable to credit the European club members with royal qualities.

Referring to the clubs in Bombay, a European writer of repute says in his book; "Why it should be a matter of pride that the most ordinary, partially literate, European salesman may enter a club from which a prince of ancient lineage is excluded, requires explanation." Against this opinion, Major General Woodyatt, son of a clergyman of the Church of England, in his book, "Under Ten Viceroys", traces much of the political troubles in India to the failure of Europeans to live exclusively in this country. This opinion will prevail with many European club members. "Moorkha vadamtu kartavyam."

The political speeches, many of them uncomplimentary to Indians, are made in European clubs between dinners and dances. If the speeches are not distasteful to self-respecting Indians, few of them can do justice to the other two items. Daksha's daughter's self-respect prompted her to destroy herself when she found the proceedings connected with the yaga in her father's house derogatory to her husband, Shiva.

I submit that the Viceroy is bound to give the final account of his rule exclusively to the Europeans whose representatives in England are the electors by whom his and his successors' administrative acts are controlled, and not by Indians.

A correspondent says in the Madras Mail, dated November 22, that Mr. Cursetjee Jamsetjee was a member of the Bombay Yacht Club in 1850. This may be quoted in subsequent applications for admission of Indians into the Byculla Club.

HINDU MAHA SABHA AND CASTE.

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

In view of the important developments in the social and political life of the country the deliberations of the ensuing annual sessions of the Hindu Maha Sabha to be held at Poona are bound to have important and far-reaching effects on the Hindu Society. The resolution of the Depressed classes held at Yeola has also shaken the Hindu Society in a way it had not been done before. The interviews that Dr. Ambedkar gave to various deputations have also to be taken into serious consideration. The opinions expressed by many prominent Hindus including the untouchables on the Yeola resolution deserve careful consideration at the sessions.

The ensuing sessions of the All India Hindu Maha Sabha to be held during the last week of this month will have seriously to consider all these problems and give a lead to the Hindu Society in clear and unambiguous terms, as it has not so far defined its aims and ideals as regards the reconstruction of the Hindu Society to suit the present-day conditions in the country.

The workers of the Hindu Maha Sabha in Bombay therefore deemed it necessary to focus the attention of the Hindu Society on some of these pressing problems that are likely to come up before the Conference at Poona, so that the delegates that arrive from all parts of India may have sufficient time to consider calmly as to their solution. At a Conference held for the purpose by the workers of the Bombay Provincial Hindu Sabha and its branches in the City, the following important resolution was passed almost unanimously:

"Whereas the caste system based on birth as at present existing is manifestly contrary to Universal Truth and morals, whereas it is the very antithesis of the fundamental spirit of the Hindu religion, whereas it flouts the elementary rights of human equality and whereas Varnashram of the Shastras from which it derives its authority is today non-existent in practice, this All-India Hindu Maha Sabha session declares its uncompromising opposition to the system and calls upon the Hindu Society to put a speedy end to it."

We hope the resolution will be seriously and dispassionately considered by all the well-wishers of the Hindu Society and particularly by the delegates that assemble at Poona and persuade the Conference to accept it as its aim and ideal in the reconstruction of the Hindu Society. Such of the delegates who approve of the idea underlying the resolution will kindly communicate their view in advance to the undersigned.

The aforesaid resolution has been forwarded to the Reception Committee of the Poona Sessions of the Conference for being placed on the Agenda of the Conference.

UNTOUCHABILITY AND HINDU SHASTRAS.

The Editor,
The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,
The editor of Harijan has rightly referred to the attempts made by Mahamahopadhyaya Shridhashastri Pathak and Prof. P. V. Kane, to show that untouchability as practised today has no foundation in the shastras and is only an unhealthy excrescence on Hinduism.

I should like to bring to the notice of all concerned, some more attempts made in Marathi literature by scholars—no less learned and renowned—in the same direction. One is the book written by Prof. Nath Hari Purandare M. A., of Poona and published by the Maharashtra Provincial Untouchability Board. The name of the book, translated in English is "Untouchability and the Temple-Entry (Consideration from the Hindu Dharmashastra point of view)." The book almost covers the same ground as covered by the Mahamahopadhyaya and very forcibly refutes all arguments advanced by orthodox people including the Sankaracharya.

Another attempt is made by Mr. Narayan Govind Chaphekar. He is a retired First class sub-judge in the British service and is at present the High Court Judge in the progressive Oudh State. Like Prof. P. V. Kane he is also a great scholar of Smriti literature and a leader of the orthodox Hindus. He is at present writing a series of articles reviewing in detail Prof. Kane's book in the Kesari and in the 7th article of his series published in Kesari of the 8th November he discusses this topic of untouchability and comes to the conclusion that it has no sanction and place in the Vedas.

There are various other booklets and articles written by oriental scholars, Mahadevashastri Divekar discusses the subject with the same conclusion in his book on Dharmashastra. You will thus see that Mahatma Gandhi was perfectly justified when he wrote in Harijan of 12th January 1934, "One of the conclusions I have reached is that there is no warrant in the Shastras for untouchability as it is practised today. My conclusion is supported by Shastris no less learned than those who challenge my conclusions and the former claim to be just as good Sanatanists as those who hold the opposite view."

It will be seen therefore that the social reformers need give absolutely no heed to the oft-refuted silly objection raised by the so-called orthodox people who worship only custom as their religion. These people will ever continue to cry in vain that their religion is in danger even when an attempt is made to further the cause of social reform strictly in conformity with the spirit of the Hindu Shastras.

"THE MOTHER OF GOD."

The Editor,
The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,
May I crave the hospitality of your columns to express my views on Jesus Christ's attitude to his mother? It is significant that those who heard him address his mother did not regard his action as reprehensible. It does not seem to have unfavourably impressed his disciples. It must be remembered that among the Jews dishonour to parents was considered to be one of the greatest of sins. Then how is it that if Jesus really dishonoured his mother, this fact could have escaped the censure and disapproval of his contemporaries? The very disciple who records the incident at Cana says, "And the word was made flesh, and dwelt among us, (and we beheld his glory, the glory as if the only-begotten of the Father), full of grace and truth." (John. 1: 14). The apostle Peter, another disciple says of Jesus, "Who did no sin, neither was guile found in his mouth." (1 Peter 2:22). In fact, the sinlessness of Jesus has been a cardinal tenet of Christianity. And I do not see how the disciples could have proclaimed such a tenet, if Jesus had really and in public, dishonoured his mother. For in such a case the enemies of Christianity could have held up Jesus' attitude to his mother as giving the lie to the disciples' assertion. But this they did not do, for the simple reason that they had no case. When Jesus asked, "Which of you convicteth me of sin?" nobody answered, though Jesus was all the time being watched by his enemies, who were trying to find fault with him.

When the rich young ruler asked him about the way of life, he (Jesus) told him to keep the commandments and quoted among others, this, "Honour thy father and thy mother." (Matt. 19: 19). If Jesus himself had broken this commandment publicly, it is passing strange that none of his enemies taunted him with having done so. They might have said "He taught others to honour their parents, but himself dishonoured his," as they said while he was hanging on the cross, "He saved others; himself he cannot save." (Matt. 27: 42).

No, there is no question of his having dishonoured his parent. Such a thought never entered the minds of his contemporaries, who were best qualified to judge of his look, tone, and manner while uttering the words in question. There must be some other explanation. There is an incident in the gospels, which throws some light on the matter. On one occasion, while Jesus was teaching

"a certain woman" of the company lifted up her voice, and said unto him, "Blessed is the womb that bare thee, and the paps which thou hast sucked." But he said, "Yea; rather, blessed are they that hear the word of God, and keep it." (Luke 11:27, 28). In the realm of spiritual values fleshly ties count for little as qualifications for spiritual preferment. The fact that Mary was the mother of Jesus did not entitle her to any special spiritual privileges. She, as well as others must hear the word of God, and keep it, if she is to be blessed. If she failed to come up to this spiritual requirement, she would be just as reprobate as anybody else. This was a lesson Mary was apt to forget. She was naturally proud of her son, and occasionally presumed too much on her relationship to him, not remembering that what mattered was not the natural but the spiritual relationship, and that "when engaged in his Father's work, merely human bonds must give place to higher obligations." (See "Life of Our Lord," by S. J. Andrews, pp. 290, 291).

The life of Jesus was dominated by the thought of his Father's will. (John 4:34). He would await the Father's bidding before doing anything. That is why he gently rebuked his mother at the feast of Cana. It was necessary for her to learn this, for it would not only teach her rightful position with regard to her son, but would also set her own mind at rest from worrying about his actions. It was, therefore, an act of love on the part of Jesus to remind her of this at the very outset of his career. (For some excellent remarks on this incident, see Dean Farrar's "Life of Christ," pp. 119)

It is a great comfort to know that those who do the will of God are more closely related to Jesus than those who are related to him by blood, but do not do the will of God. Jesus is the Elder Brother of all those who do his father's will, no matter what their race or colour may be. There is no nepotism in the kingdom of God. It is a democracy. The only qualification for entrance to this kingdom is spiritual fitness, doing the will of God, not fleshly relationship. (2 Cor. 5: 16).

[This subject has been discussed threadbare and we do not intend to publish any more correspondence on it. — Ed., I. S. R.]

THE END AND THE MEANS.

Freedom and efficiency always go together. You cannot have freedom simply because you want to have it. You must be fit to be free. The fight for freedom is but a process of reorganising yourself into a free life. It is not a negative movement but a positive march. It cannot be achieved through constituent assemblies or orations or debates. No society, no nation could be ever free as long as it could not stand as an organic whole against foreign aggressions or internal betrayals. Freedom is the achievement of that harmonious life actuated by internal law and order, internal social justice. Neither economic nor political freedom is possible in any country as long as it does not possess the fitness or efficiency to maintain that freedom or utilise it for its growth. The true meaning of Swaraj is efficiency.

India is a country surrounded by a halo of ancient glory, spiritual achievements and great and successful religious movements. It is a land of great experiences and meeting scene of various cultures. It is the home of Vedas and Sankara and Kalidasa. Great monarchs have ruled over this land, including Asoka and Akbar. Love, heroism, intellect and spiritualism have reached their zenith in this country. But unfortunately, the bulk of Indian humanity was always kept out of these achievements. The majority lived and died almost untouched by that greatness, or that greatness never reached the average man. It is all due to the elimination by various means of the majority of its people from the open rivalry of life, keeping the fields of thought as well as action to a reserved few who monopolised them with a hereditary right. And the voice of the woman who is the representative of the ultimate human ideal and in whom mankind sacrifices the present for the future, is completely shut out. It is this organised social injustice meted out to the greatest number of our people that is the main cause which killed social efficiency and made us slaves.

The majority of people do not know what is actually going on in this country. They were never interested either in your political arguments or economic debates. Invaders came and went, they did not bother about it. They did not differentiate between the French diplomat and the British tradesman. They are not aware how modern civilisation was imported and how it massed in the great cities of their country. They do not know of what stuff are made our rulers, indigenous as well as foreign. But what are they doing? They are waiting, indefinitely waiting for action. They are something like a reservoir of human energy waiting to be utilised for constructive growth and liberation or to break the banks that hold them in a violent revolution. All types of oppressors must be prepared for such a catastrophe or yield even now. They have to become selfless, they have to become wise.

The change is imminent. But the hope lies in the accumulated wisdom which might lead the oppressed people through a constructive revolution towards perfect justice. Wars might threaten us and nationalism might grow into a more feverish jealousy but we, as living people, need not take notice of all these, for they do not belong to us. They belong to the selfish few who see the necessity of the existence of poverty which alone can supply enough soldiers for their growing armies, who see the necessity of colossal ignorance, which alone can conceal their sinister motives.

Most of those who attempt at social reconstruction, who devote their lives for social reform, unfortunately are satisfied with small scale patch-work, leading the people nowhere. Among themselves there is neither unity of thought nor unity of action. With the best of intentions they do not conduct their movements on scientific principles but on their sentiments, their own likes and dislikes. Each leader is a dictator in his own institution and he protects his will against all possible 'assaults' of reason. As long as the reformation or reconstruction work is not based on scientific principles, there can be no united action, and without unity no large scale work is possible, no thorough-going reorganisation towards complete freedom of mankind. "I do my bit" philosophy is the origin of a wrong satisfaction and a discouragement to greater work. Imbued with that and similar other philosophies, we and our politicians go about and to the villagers who labour without rest throughout the day, who drag their lives in unventilated huts, without any sort of recreation and with not even a pair of clothes to wear preach diligence, prudence and economy. Alas! We are not ashamed of ourselves.

Whither India? Pandit Jawaharlal has answered, "Surely to the great human goal of social and economic equality, to the ending of all exploitation of nation by nation and class by class, to national freedom within the frame-work of an international co-operative socialist federation." But this is not a complete answer. An answer that does not include an answer to the 'how?' which immediately follows is not complete. The ideal placed before us by the Pandit is not a new one. We are acquainted with that since the time of Plato, although we owe our gratitude to him for reiterating and drawing the attention of all the active leaders and politicians to it. Social, economic and international equality demand a more comprehensive and thorough-going action than is possible in the field of politics. You must start your work with the people. No high class philanthropy nor middle class ideologies can save the country. You must approach the poor man. In his hands lie the keys of the future. Liberating him from all sorts of oppression, religious, social and economic and bringing him into the open rivalry of life is the only way of achieving efficiency. You may say you cannot do all or any of these unless you control the existing government. But it would be easier and safer to run the government when you are fully prepared for it. Nor is it safe to postpone your other work until you achieve self-government. After all running the government is the least part of our task ahead.

The main source of efficiency of a society is its moral capacity, its character. We are slaves to the extent we are lacking in that moral wealth. A society which kept its women perpetually behind the Purdha, which produced a class of millions of untouchables, which is the home of various sorts of communal jealousies and bickerings can claim to possess anything but character. During the process of unending social oppression, all our great qualities have been thwarted, even murdered. We are wanting in heroism, in courage, in that noble aspiration for freedom, because in the very beginning we have killed ourselves, we have killed our soul. Intellect we had enough, we have enough. But intellect divorced of great quality may be able to produce great scientists, great businessmen and politicians but it cannot produce free men, it cannot produce a free society.

The only way open to us now is to take back the oppressed people into national, economic and social life by means of an organised movement. This principle should be the basis of all our social reconstruction activities. And the aim should be to establish social, moral and economic equality in society. For equality is the greatest of moral traits of a society and inequality the greatest of social vices.

All altruism, all love for the poor should take the shape of an organised movement and here, no personal sentiments no personal likes and dislikes should come in. The power that is greater than all military powers and governments that are based on them is sincere constructive work. Trade and commerce, industry and production in whose hands the destinies of the modern world lie, are neither the monopoly of the imperialist nor the capitalist. They are the property of those who work for them. Those sincere workers who have identified their lives with the life of the society should join together into an organised body in order to monopolise or socialise all the economic activities on its behalf. To use a more correct word, they have to moralise all its economic activities. They can easily compete with all the existing monopolies for their activities are devoid of the personal profit motive. The proprietor and the ultimate beneficiary is the society itself. And if it is conducted on proper lines it would absorb all the young men and women in the country as its social workers and unemployment would automatically cease to exist.

But the leaders of such a movement should take care that the movement does not end there. After all man is neither complete matter nor complete divinity. He is an alloy of both. Economic emancipation is only a means by which you would provide the members of the society with leisure and relief to pursue intellectual happiness, for education is the greatest equalising force. Take two graduates. There may exist still some intellectual inequality between them for their training was not complete and was not based on their psychological inclinations. But morally they are equals. They feel there is a common ground between them and that they should treat each other as equals. Along with the economic movement you should conduct an intellectual movement which would raise all the members of the society to a standard of intellectual equality, at the same time enabling them to realise the responsibilities of citizenship. Thus moralising economic activities and education are the two main conditions of efficiency. And efficiency is the content of freedom, the soul of Swaraj.

HINDU SOCIETY AND THE DEPRESSED CLASSES.*

(BY PRAKASH NARAIN SAFRU.)

The fundamental institution on which Hindu society remains founded is caste. It is unnecessary to speculate into the origin of this most amazing system, which Hindu India has developed and perfected. It would be equally futile to enter into any historical discussions as to whether caste, as it existed at one time in our history, was defensible. Certain it is that it has eaten into the vitals of Hindu society, degraded man, exalted priesthood and made the priest the dominating factor in the life of the individual and the Hindu community. It hampers today and has done so in the past the development of the civic spirit and co-operative capacity needed for working democratic institutions and it is undoubtedly inconsistent with the principle of the fundamental equality of man. For the basic idea underlying it is that what fixes a man's status for ever in life is his birth and that this birth has been determined for him by his actions in a past life. A society founded on an institution, which is based on this rooted belief, cannot be a dynamic force in a changing world—a world which is moving fast towards newer and higher conceptions of social solidarity and social responsibility—for the evils around us.

The mistake so far in the Mahatma's campaign has been to regard untouchability as an isolated phenomenon to be tackled separately from any attack on the basic institution which gives it vitality and keeps it going. The problem of social reconstruction has to be viewed as one whole and the removal of untouchability is but part of a larger movement the object of which is to renovate and purify society and free the individual from the thralldom of ages. Hindu society, if it is to function as a live force in India, must therefore accept the position that attack on caste and all that caste implies has become urgently necessary. A good many of us will be prepared to admit the theoretical validity of the arguments against caste but when it comes to breaking its bonds in personal life we fail. To imagine that in our attack on caste we shall be able to carry the more orthodox of our friends is to delude ourselves. It is certain that the more conservative sections of Hindu society will not be with us in any organised campaign against caste. But we cannot allow our pace to be dictated by the ultra-orthodox. Who has ever heard of a real reformation in a society emanating from the leaders of the orthodox church itself? Everywhere it is the few who give the lead to the life and thought of a people and if the few are clear in their minds in this country then what educated India thinks today, uneducated India will begin to think tomorrow. We have to accustom our people, therefore, with the idea that the structure of our society requires fundamental change and that that fundamental change cannot be achieved without a concerted attack on the institution which hampers our progress and arrests our development.

The Mahatma, though in his own life he has shown that he follows none of the rules laid down for caste, has not yet openly associated himself with any direct attack on it. Dr. Ambedkar would have been right therefore in insisting that the time has come for Hindu leaders to take a bolder stand towards this institution and that the attack should be more insistent, more vigorous and more direct. Success in the direction of abolition of caste will not be easy. Where the great reformers of the past failed we are not likely to succeed without much effort, much sacrifice and much individual suffering. Caste has a wonderful hold over all classes and sections of Hindus. The depressed classes are themselves divided into numerous castes and sub-castes.

It would be a pity indeed if in our attack on caste we were to get entangled into metaphysical controversies and discussions. We have as Hindus to teach the Hindu what he understands today very imperfectly that religion is not metaphysics, that it is something purely personal, and that caste is not an essential part of it. Realising that the integrity of Hindu society is essential to the advancement of this land, that Hindu solidarity is worth having in the larger interests of Indian nationalism itself, we should concentrate our attack as reformers on the most fundamental institution of our society and seek unity among ourselves on this basis.

The plan suggested indeed is not new. It dates back to Mr. Ranade and the strenuous efforts that he made through the Social Conference Movement to renovate Hindu society. The true lines of advance were indicated by him very nearly 59 years back in his masterly addresses to the Conference, and we need to have something of that old spirit to guide us in the troublous times ahead of us. I am not pleading for a new Protestant sect but I am urging that on these social issues, at any rate, whatever our individual attitudes in regard to metaphysical and theological questions might be, we should as Hindus who have a heritage to preserve and enrich, take a decisive line and work wholeheartedly for a more radical cure than the mere removal of physical untouchability. For until we can do this, there is, it strikes me, little hope for Hindu society, split up as it is into endless castes and sub-castes. It is to be regretted that the Social Conference Movement which promised so much at one time and which in the earlier years of the national movement did much to educate public opinion on vital matters has almost ceased to function. The old Social Conferences which used to accompany our political gatherings were useful for the purposes of stock-taking and it is a pity that they have gone out of fashion.

The social problem must be viewed as one whole and not piecemeal and the untouchability issue cannot be considered apart from the wider problems raised by the existence of caste itself. What gives vitality to caste is not the restrictions against inter-dining which are in practice disappearing but the privileged position of the priest and sentiment against intercaste marriage. Fortunately with the emancipation of women accompanied as it is with an intellectual awakening among them, in both directions a change in public sentiment is slowly taking place.

NOTES

India and Lancashire:—In our leading article last week, it was remarked that English education was the most disinterested gift of Britain to India. The very reverse of it may be said of the policy followed in regard to industry and commerce. The facts are fairly well known. Those who wish to refresh their memories may refer to "the Ruin of Indian Trade and Industries" by Major B. D. Basu, a third edition of which has been published by Mr. Kamananda Chatterjee, Editor of the Modern Review, Calcutta (Rs. 2-8-0). We are loth to rake up old annals but the mentality which inspired the old policy has not altogether disappeared, as shown in the proceedings in Bombay during the examination of the Lancashire deputation by the Tariff Board, appointed to enquire into the claim of the Indian Textile Industry for adequate protection from outside competition. This is the first time that an English deputation has been invited or admitted to appear before an enquiry set on foot to consider the conditions of an Indian industry. We do not know if an Indian deputation will be allowed to have its say in matters similarly affecting a British industry. However that may be, the present arrangement is an improvement on the old practice of Lancashire bringing political pressure to bear on the Indian Government through the India Office in London. We assume, of course, that the old, bad practice has been given up once and for all, and that, having placed their case before the Tariff Board, the deputation will loyally abide by its conclusions. We doubt, however, whether another deputation will face an enquiry of this kind. Mr. Fazl Rahimtoola, the senior Member of the Board, though not its Chairman, brought to the notice the members of the Lancashire deputation the obvious truths which they seem to have overlooked. He politely pointed out to them textiles cannot be said to be overproduced so long as India had to import them to complete her requirements. He also pointed out that at an enquiry into the need for giving further protection to the home industry, there can be no question of reducing the existing import duty which was felt to be insufficient.

Rationale of Protection:—To the plea that the superior quality of goods produced by Lancashire did not compete with the goods produced at present by Indian mills, there are two obvious answers. First, though Indian mills do not now produce the better qualities, they can, as Mr. D. N. Sirur remarked, easily do so by importing Egyptian cotton just as Lancashire does. It will save the Indian consumer the freight on cotton from Egypt to England and, then, the freight on the cloth from Lancashire to India, which he pays now in the price of Lancashire cloth. Secondly, it will give more work and wages to Indian mill workers which, after all, is the main consideration. The consumer whose interests bulk so largely in Lancashire representations, himself wants to consume only Indian-made goods and is prepared to pay for it even a little more than what the imported cloth costs. He realises that the import duty is necessary in order to keep his own people at work and that, if foreign cloth is allowed to capture the market, many thousands of men and women will be thrown out of work and that he will have to bear the cost of maintaining them either by taxation in prison or by private charity in their slums. This is the well-known argument for protection to home industries and a well-tryed one also. It is surprising that the hard-headed men from Lancashire should have supposed that Indians would be unaware of it. But the most sensational statement in favour of dispensing with protection, came from the Calcutta Chamber of (Foreign) Commerce. That powerful body maintained that India had no natural facilities for cotton manufacture and should require no protection! This, of the most ancient home of the cotton industry! Britain, of course, is, in their opinion, the natural home of the cotton industry, although she grows not an ounce of cotton!

Demand for more Universities and Colleges:—Notwithstanding the fulminations of the Commissioner of Education with the Government of India, the demand in the country for more Universities and more colleges is becoming insistent. Orissa has formulated a scheme for a Utkala University; Kerala has appointed an influential committee to negotiate with the Madras, Travancore and Cochin Governments for a Federal University covering the area anciently designated as Kerala; Sind is making as yet inarticulate noises expressive of a desire to have a Sindhi University. Ahmedabad, which has a full-fledged Government College of Arts and Science, has formulated a scheme for a second one and has applied or is about to apply to Bombay University for affiliation. This is preparing the ground for a University embracing Gujarat as well as the Gujarat States the idea of which has been in the air. Jalgaon in Khandesh has three High Schools and is planning to have an Arts College. The promoters of these schemes are non-officials and they are not at all considering the question from the point of view of employment. Their desire is to conserve the culture of their province and link it with the new culture. This is a laudable desire and, when it is borne in mind that University education is the best solvent of our social perplexities, it will be obvious that this movement is a vital factor in social progress. Higher education alone provides us with the means of reconstructing society on a non-caste, non-communal basis. As pointed out by the Hon. Mr. P. N. Saprú in his article in the Twentieth Century, from which we made excerpts in last week's Reformer, it is only then that the institution of antayajas will make its final exit. So long as there are castes there will be outcastes, if not of the current, then of some new type.

An Orthodox Entente:—We reprint today a part of an article in the Modern Review written by Pandit Jawharlal Nehru during his detention in Almora prison. Putting together certain orthodox Hindu demonstrations against the Sarda Act and Sir Mahomed Iqbal's commendation of it and call to Muslims to stand on their ancient ways, the Pandit conjures up a future India in which the Hindu priest and the Muslim Moulvi will control the fate of the country. "I do not think that I shall get on at all under the joint regime; I may even land myself in prison. I have spent a long enough period of my life in prison under the British Government and I see no particular reason why I should add to it under the new dispensation," writes the Pandit. India is a land of religions. Her history is predominantly one of religion and philosophy. Her greatest achievements are in that realm. Her inspiration is derived from religion. She can not move hand or foot without a religious reason. In this land, karma or kismet has planted one who proclaims that he has no faith in and no use for religion. Neither has he faith or use for the secular British Government which considers him so dangerous that it not only puts and keeps him in prison but carries on a propaganda against him in its Administration on Report, which has evoked protests in the British Press usually averse to any criticism of the doings of the man on the spot. The New Statesman, indeed, accuses the Governor of Bengal of hitting the Pandit below the belt.

Groundless Fear:—The Pandit's fear that he may have to spend the remainder of his days in prison under a coalition of Hindu and Muslim orthodoxy, is groundless. Hinduism allows wide latitude of belief and disbelief. Even as regards conduct, it absolves the sanyasin of all restrictions, and the Pandit will, we fancy, come under the Gita definition of a sanyasin as one who is disinterested in his actions and not one who merely gives up religious rites and dons the orange robe. He may even be elevated to the rank of an avatar like Gautame Buddha one of whose sayings the Pandit cited in another recent writing of his. Every idea can be worked out into a logical absurdity. The Pandit himself admits that his picture might prove to be a somewhat exaggerated picture of what might happen. It is a highly, grotesquely exaggerated picture. As a fact, his picture of the future may well stand for a picture of the past. A fusion between Hindu and Muslim in thought and life was in progress and had made notable progress when the British came on the scene. This was the theme of Ranade's memorable address to the National Social Conference held at Lucknow in the last year of the last century. The process has been interrupted temporarily but historical processes can not be interrupted permanently and this too will be resumed as soon as the obstacles in the way disappear as they are bound to do. An understanding between the conservative elements in the communities of India which Pandit Jawharlal dreads, is the best hope for the future of the country. Unity can be permanent only if it rests on the stable part of human nature, which is conservatism.

The Problem of Religious Education:—In the current number of Visva-Bharati, Dr. Rabin-dranath Tagore has contributed an interesting article on "Religious Education." He describes the problem confronting the modern Hindu as follows:—"Our educated communities in India, at the present time, are faced with the same problems which beset the peoples of Europe. Our intellect and our will are forcibly attracted outwards, and our soul is left dormant in a world of emptiness. Owing to our absorption in the external, we have not even the time to realise the gaping disproportion between our inner and outer life. Such religious activity as still remains to us represents the inertia of habit; it continues because we ignore it by our conformity which is too lethargic to question itself. Meanwhile our present secular education is busy plying the axe at the root of orthodox beliefs. In our sacred books, as well as in those of Europe, we have medieval theories of creation and antiquated views about history and geography. These are so mixed up with the doings Adjustment Impossible:—Dr. Tagore continues: "Not only in the case of the puranic stories, but also in that of Shastric injunctions and social practices, adjustment to modern knowledge and experience becomes impossible. It is hopeless to bring science, history or modern business requirements, within the old scriptural pale. In these circumstances, there cannot but ensue in India as in Europe, a fight to the finish between modern secular teaching and orthodox religious teaching. Indeed, whether we are conscious of it or not, such a struggle is already in progress in our country. It is possible for the orthodox to stand outside the conflict altogether. If they do not object to blind belief, or loose thinking, if, in their view, a strenuous endeavour to apprehend the truth is not an essential requisite in the formation of human character, they need not face the problem at all. But, in the case of us, we believe, moderns, who are as much our children as definite acquired a scientific to the question, the question acute of Sir Samuel Hoare:—Sir we to give tare has resigned the Foreign religiouship in the British Cabinet. We are Dr. r for Sir Samuel Hoare. His speech at the League of Nations Assembly on September 11 on the Italo-Ethiopian War was a really great speech, notwithstanding his attempt to camouflage his Indian constitutional reform as a grant of self-government to this country. It raised him to a pinnacle in the estimation of the world. But the position has not been sustained and the terms which he, with M. Laval, drafted for presentation to Signor Mussolini and the Ethiopian Emperor as an equitable arrangement for concluding peace, have met with general condemnation. These terms which included a cession of territory to Italy and other concessions, by Ethiopia evoked a storm of protest and Mr. Eden—Sir Samuel Hoare being advised to take rest by his doctors—had to tell the League Committee that they were not sacrosanct and could be modified even League. Signor Mussolini made a may north in inaugurating the new town of disease. amounted to a contemptuous—Hoare peace proposals. given a reply which Racial Issues in South Africa:—In spite of the claims of the Oxford Group Movement that racial feelings have improved since the Buchanites took out a team to South Africa, there is little evidence to show a change for the better. Recently, on the other hand, a deputation of the South African Indian Congress called on the Minister of Health, Mr. Hoffmeyer, to protest against the expropriation of land owned in Mayville by Indians under the Slums Act. Mr. Hoffmeyer had emphasised during the debate on the Act in the South African Parliament that the Bill was merely intended to remove slum conditions, irrespective of the colour or race of owner or tenant. But expropriating land owned by Indians and eventually evicting them. In the Mayville area thirty-six Indian property-owners have been cleared because, according to the report of the Health Officer, the site represents a non-European salient penetrating into a good class European area. What Mr. Hoffmeyer probably meant was that the European ownership of attractive areas occupied by Indians would not keep the White Government of South Africa from expropriating and reserving them for their own use. There is no moral basis for the action and, therefore, there can be no appeal for fairplay. That it will not be long before this White position becomes impossible, makes the race all the more anxious to attempt consolidation of its position with the illusory security of expropriatory acts.

Indian Opinion's Lead:—An important lead to the Indian community has been given by Indian Opinion in regard to the race issue as it affects them. Commenting on a recent donation for an Indian ward in a general hospital in Pretoria, it says: "By building these wards, Indians are once for all tacitly accepting the principle of segregation. Why should separate wards for Indians be necessary in General Hospitals? Have not Indians paid towards establishing them equally with other communities and are they not paying to run them by rates and taxes which are imposed on them equally with other sections of the community?"

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

BOMBAY, December 21, 1935.

AN EXPERIMENT IN VILLAGE HYGIENE.

We referred in an editorial note last week to the report on "A Controlled Experiment on Rural Hygiene in Syria" by Dr. Stuart Carter Dodd. In order to acquire the requisite background for the experiment, Dr. Dodd went through a very arduous and strenuous preparation. He went to live for several weeks at a time in the villages of Northern Syria. He also visited Bedouins in the desert and the Kurds in their tent encampments in the mountains, and villages in Egypt, Palestine, Iraq and Persia. His knowledge of Turkish enabled him to communicate with the people of the Turkish speaking villages. With Arabs he spoke through an interpreter. He accompanied the doctors of the itinerant clinic of the Near East Foundation on their visits and their systematic medical and physical examination of every soul in two villages. He slept in the homes of the village people and in their tents and observed the habits of the family as to washing, defecation, sleeping, eating and other routine patterns of life. As the result of this exhaustive study of the villagers' life, he gives many useful hints as to what to avoid in working among them. All folk practices, he says, are not to be rejected as superstitions, and all western medical advice is not to be accepted as sound in every given situation. He mentions, as an instance of a sound folk practice, the use of pumpkin seeds for worms. As an instance of conventional western ideas which might backfire in some situations, he refers to taking baths in the village. The Syrians' idea of a bath is the Turkish steam bath which requires special provision for slow cooling off after the bath. Hygienic slogans like "bathe often", he says, are, therefore, to be discarded, or followed up with a new and detailed technique of bathing which adapts the rule to the local culture. Practices connected with personal cleanliness are, in many matters, according to high medical authorities, better conceived in the East; and the Westerner who sticks to his, is likely to alienate the feelings of those whom he wishes to serve.

Dr. Kellogg of the Battle Creek Sanatorium narrates in one of his books a story told him by a Christian Missionary returned home after many years service in India. The Missionary was once interrupted, while holding service in a Bengali village, by a native who rose up and shouted "This man isn't fit to preach. He wipes off with paper." The entire audience, he continues, fled as though from a leper. An Australian judge who visited India some years ago and wrote a book of his observations, remarked that the sage or saint who taught the Indian that the way to heaven lies through cleaning his teeth first thing in the morning, was a great benefactor of his race. In personal hygiene the Indian has little to learn from a Westerner. On the contrary, as Dr. Kellogg observes, the latter may learn not a few lessons in self-respect and personal cleanliness from these "benighted children of Nature." The social worker should carefully note these practices and be careful to observe them himself. Personal cleanliness in the East is not next to godliness. It is godliness itself. Dr. Dodd warns social workers in Syria against disregarding definite religious and social prejudices. He alludes to the murder at the last Syrian Census of two enumerators because they enquired with insufficient tact into the personnel in the harem, the women's quarters. Even in Armenian Christian families a wife may not open her lips to utter a word in the presence of her husband's male relatives. As in India, the appearance of a man with a note book and pencil was enough to scare away the villagers and to make them tell lies without any purpose. Medical relief, especially by women doctors, was found to be the readiest way to cultivate the goodwill and win the confidence of village people. This is a point which the Karnatak Sahitya Parishat should take note of in its scheme of village lectures. In the Syrian experiment, except the American nurse, the rest of the party allotted to a village were all natives speaking the principal vernaculars of the country.

We have recited all this from the Report because we should like to clear any misapprehension that might arise from our reference, in the editorial note last week, to the specialised character and standardising tendency of American methods. It is evident that the leaders of the Syrian experiment are doing every thing humanly possible to put themselves in the skin of the Syrian villager. Their object is purely humanitarian. They are not out to make proselytes. Religion and politics are blotted out of the picture of Syrian life with which the experiment is concerned. Syrian workers freely quote the authority of the Holy Koran and the Christian Bible wherever possible in support of their propaganda. Dr. Dodd and his colleagues are concerned solely with the hygiene of the villages, Hygiene being defined to mean all the knowledge, practices and environmental conditions which tend to increase the health as measured by decreased morbidity and mortality rates and increased longevity. "It is not health itself but only the known causes of it and those which are under the control of the individual or the community," they explain. The seven villages which formed the area of this experiment in hygiene, are situated in a Syrian State under the French Mandate of the League of Nations and they would seem to be economically better off than most villages in those country. The average income of, of creation (family?) is estimated to be 80 dollars and geogr rupees. An adequate supply with the doings water and an ample are mentioned among the outstanding good features in three of the villages. One of the rare specimen of colourful writing in the Report, reads: "While villagers share the only universal democracy of possessing twenty-four hours a day, they have less with which to fill them. So the whole pace of life is leisurely, with no hurry to overtax the nervous system. Insanity is extremely rare, although feeble-mindedness was suspected several times." The villagers spoke in appreciation of the workers but actual progress during the period under review was slow. Miss Slack in her reports to the Near East Foundation speaks occasionally of individuals who have learned occasionally to wash their children's faces or sweep their dooryards, or to "de-gas" their babies after nursing. The villagers in one village promptly repaired a well when they were supplied with cement by the Near East Foundation.

It is difficult to estimate whether this method would yield better results in an Indian village. Personal hygiene, as already pointed out, is fairly good here. No persuasion is needed to teach the people to bathe daily, for instance. Provided water can be had, every one would like to bathe as often as possible. The provision of an adequate supply of pure water is the main problem of many Indian villages. Next in importance is the removal of illiteracy which is the principal cause of the backwardness of villagers. The best results are to be hoped for by social service by people who seek to learn as well as to teach. The evils of 'standardising' creep in when the social worker assumes his type of behaviour to be in all cases preferable to that of the people among whom he works. The question is, whether in the same conditions, climatic, economic, educational and political, he would have done otherwise. Every little counts and even the attempt to isolate and deal with one particular item in human behaviour apart from others, which together form 'environment', has its use. But in the nature of things it must be slight and fluctuating. This Dr. Dodd fully recognises. Referring to the economic depression which affected Syrian villages during the period, he observes: "In so far as hygiene is an effect of wealth (in the interaction of the two), the decrease of the wealth factor would tend to lower the hygiene status. Further more, whatever effects these economical factors of rainfall, crop production prices, road improvement, and tax rebates may have had, they operated equally on experimental and control samples." In villages which enjoy the advantages of pure water, good milk and freedom from contagion as the Syrian villages do, personal hygiene may go far to increase hygienic conditions as defined by Dr. Dodd. Where these are wanting as in many Indian villages, even a high standard of personal cleanliness may not ensure to the people immunity from disease.

THE CASE FOR BIRTH CONTROL.

Birth Control influences neither the population nor the breed nor the morality of a community. Therefore neither economist, eugenist nor priest as such should have any special interest in the matter. Much of the confusion in which the birth control issue is steeped today, is due to the failure of propagandists to disentangle the movement from the complications brought on by the advocacy or opposition of enthusiasts from one or other of these three groups. To them have been added the conflicting voices of doctors. The medical profession has for years been divided on the birth control issue, the supporters urging the use of contraceptives as a necessary, and even only, compromise between the extremes of continence and excessive child-bearing and their opponents enthusing over, according to the exigencies of the moment, either the virtues of self-restraint in building character or the beneficial effects of pregnancy on the normal woman. But it is in the arguments of the dissenting medical world that one finds defined the limits within which birth control can make a real contribution to human well-being. The birth control supporter is advancing an unanswerable argument when he pleads the cause of those women whose lives have been worn out by excessive child-bearing. His opponent has reason on his side when he points out that 'the sexual instinct of women is unduly stimulated without those periods of natural quiescence induced by pregnancy and attention to the newlyborn infant.' And both together present the strongest case against the existing conditions in which the sale of contraceptives is a trade unconnected with the medical profession.

The failure of medicine to assimilate the birth control movement has been a deplorable one. Dr. A. P. Pillay, editor of Marriage Hygiene, felt it necessary to start classes in 1934 for demonstrating the technique of contraception to doctors. It is a disgrace, to say the least, to let loose on a society in which every chemist's shop deals in contraceptives and every dealer shouts his wares at the public through the medical, and even general, press, medical practitioners who are ignorant of the elements of the subject. This is not peculiar to India. Even in England the contraceptive trade has outstripped the birth control clinic. Dr. Harry Roberts in his "Everyman in Health and in Sickness," feels called upon to utter a serious warning. "It must be emphasized," he writes, "that each case should be considered individually by a doctor...A method which is suitable in one case may be quite useless or harmful in another...Advertisements of contraceptives usually make unjustifiable claims for the success and suitability of the advertiser's own particular products, and it is unwise to use either a soluble chemical contraceptive or a mechanical appliance except on the advice of a doctor"; and he adds, "who is experienced in the technique of contraception." In the United States, the "traffic" in birth control is, if possible, worse. In January 1934, the supporters of birth control met in conference at Washington to organise the dissemination of birth control information through proper channels, i. e., the doctors. They also found it necessary to warn the public against the increasing flood of contraceptive products openly sold all over the country by pedlars. Miss Elizabeth Garrett wrote in an article (Reformer, February 17, 1934):—"Peddling is on the increase and the methods employed are often highly unscrupulous...One concern has been sending its saleswomen among the very poor to peddle a certain intra-uterine device that is dubious enough even when fitted by a physician and is almost sure to cause serious trouble when placed by the woman herself. Mrs. Sanger made the nation birth-control conscious. And in so doing she prepared the way for the commercial exploitation that was to come. To bring the control of contraceptive methods and products, into the hands of those best qualified to possess it and out of the hands of the commercial exploiters, Mrs. Sanger formed a National Committee on Federal Legislation for Birth Control."

Mrs. Sanger had realised, therefore, in her own country the evils of propaganda among people who are not yet ready for it. The proper thing for her and other supporters of birth control would have been to get the medical teachers and practitioners to adopt her view before launching on her campaign. Her first approach to the American public to create opinion and then overawe the medical profession into accepting her views, was excusable as she herself could not foresee all the consequences of her propaganda. But her repeating the entire procedure in India again without a warning of the evils it has brought down on the United States, can only be compared to the firing of houses to produce roast pig. Mrs. Sanger is welcome to this country as a woman who has laboured more than most others to relieve suffering in American homes. But her visit would have been of real value to us if she had told us of the difficulties she had to encounter and the weaknesses of the birth control movement in her home country. The stock arguments in favour of a similar movement in India can be turned out by any Indian enthusiast who goes through her written works, and even adapted to Indian conditions better than she could do. It is most unfortunate that she has not thought us worthy of this courtesy. And the tour through India will serve merely to rally admirers around her meetings. But the real work which has to be done behind the meetings and conferences will be left undone.

Every married couple must decide, and whatever the propaganda of birth-controllist or larger-family propagandist might urge, will decide for itself whether it is going to use contraceptives or not. We do not think that any woman who decides against having children and persuades her husband to her view is guilty of any heinous offence against society. But it is certainly necessary that those who proclaim birth control as a means of bringing about a new heaven and a new earth, should take some trouble first to ensure that their propaganda can be supplemented by competent medical advice. That is the urgent task of the birth control worker. It is not to be solved by the immediate establishment of birth control clinics, by educating our doctors on the technique and by having contraception on the college syllabus of medical students. The methods of the purveyor of patent medicines must be given up for a more scientific approach. Birth control will not solve every national problem that confronts us today. But as a relief to women suffering from the ravages of too frequent childbirth, it has a valuable contribution to make. It belongs to the maternity clinic and should never have been allowed to break loose from it. We trust that the birth control supporters in this country will concentrate on achieving this in the near future.

THE LATE REV. RAHMAT MASIH WAIZ.

Rahmat Ali was born on the 11th May, 1856 at Narowal, District Sialkot, Punjab. He came of a noble Muslim stock. The Mughal Court at Delhi conferred on his ancestors the hereditary title of Mian or Prince. His grand father, Mian Faiz Ali, was a man of great wealth, influence and learning and was so much respected by the people that when the Province came under the rule of the Sikhs the hereditary title was decreed to be continued and he was made a courtier in the court of Maharaja Ranjit Singh at Lahore.

Mian Husain Bakhsh, Rahmat's uncle had turned Christian before the Mutiny. His father, Mian Ali Mohammed, along with his two sons, one of whom was Rahmat, and two daughters embraced Christianity in 1870. Rahmat, at the time, was about fourteen years of age and he assumed Rahmat Masih as his Christian name. This revolutionary religious conversion in a leading Muslim family created a sensation. It was entirely due to the saintly Christian life of the late Rev. Bateman, the first Missionary of the Church of England at Narowal, who lived amongst the people, adopted their dress, language and mode of living. However, owing to popular opposition to the family of the new converts, they were obliged to leave their home and also willingly surrendered their rights to the properties. After their exodus many other families turned Christian and antagonism against them died down and Rahmat with his parents, brothers and sisters were happy to return to their home.

After passing out from the local Mission school Rahmat was sent to Lahore for a medical course. He remained in the medical school for about two years, but his spirit loved freedom and being of a religious trend of mind he felt a call to serve Christ in the apostolic manner. He went, independent of any agency, from place to place spreading the message of Christ, but owing to his youth he did not receive encouragement from any source. He had a natural aptitude for journalism. When an opportunity offered itself he was appointed the Editor of "Vakil-e-Hind," the first Urdu weekly at Amritsar in 1882. Since then his interest in journalism never waned. He was entrusted with the Editorship of "Nur-e-Afshan" in 1887, which he discharged with distinction for ten years. He dictated his last article a week before he died.

All these years he had a craving to serve Christ as an independent evangelist. He joined the Divinity College at Lahore. On the completion of his studies, he was offered a post under the Church Missionary Society, which he refused. He was a great admirer of Guru Nanak and Kabir. He became a Christian Sadhu and roamed all over the Province and came in touch with leaders of other religions. He was welcomed by the Arya Samajists, loved by the Sikhs and respected by the Muslims. When Chet Ram, the founder of the "Chetramis"—a Christian Sect in the Punjab—died, the See of Chet Ram was offered to him, but he declined it. He spread the Gospel of Christ in every village and hamlet in the Kangra Valley and worked with the late Dr. Pennell of Bannu, who too donned the saffron cloak of the Indian Sadhu, and toured the Bannu Province on foot. In his later years, he was a close associate of Sadhu Sunder Singh.

He persistently refused to be ordained because he felt that his movement in the service of Christ would be restricted. But eventually the Bishop of Lahore prevailed upon him and he took orders in 1914. He had the honour of being presented, as an Indian Christian representative, to His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales in 1922. He retired from Service in 1929 and died at Lahore on the 10th December, 1935. His death is a high land-mark in the history of the Christian Church in the Punjab.

The late Rev. Waiz was a staunch Church of England man. He believed in all the orthodox dogmas of the Church, but Christ, the "Name Supreme," was his religion. He remained a true son of India to the end. Western civilisation never appealed to him but, correctly reading the signs of the time, he did not deny his children the benefit of western education. His noble life was a result of the contact between true Christianity and Indian, particularly, Muslim culture and heritage. He had no use for the modern method of missionary work in India. He often said that so long as the Western Missionaries did not identify themselves completely with the Indian life, the evangelisation of India was a hopeless mission. He was mainly responsible for Indianising the mode of worship in the Indian Christian Churches in the Punjab. He believed that by trying to convert the Indian masses the Christian missionaries had adopted the course of least resistance. He was a fearless critic of the work and policy of Western Christian Missions in India. But he was deeply grateful to the Missionaries for bringing him to Christ.

The late Rev. Waiz was a poet of no mean calibre. His Ode in Urdu on the Death of Queen Victoria was one of the most beautiful pieces that was written on the occasion. His "Rahat-e-Dil" (Delight of the Heart) is the only popular Hymn book used by the Punjabi and Hindustani speaking congregations in Northern India. His versified account of the death of John the Baptist and the story of the Good Samaritan are known to every Christian boy and girl in the Punjab. He twice revised the Urdu translations of A & M Hymn Book.

He translated into Punjabi the four Gospels, the Psalms and the Common Prayer Book.

MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE IN INDIA.

The Parsi Marriage Bill, as amended in Select Committee, has been published at page 70 of the U. P. Gazette of October 12, 1933. Section 31 runs as follows:—

"If a husband or wife shall have been continually absent from his or her wife or husband for the space of 7 years, and shall not have been heard of as being alive within that time by those persons who would have naturally heard of him or her, had he or she been alive, the marriage of such husband or wife may, at the instance of either party thereto, be dissolved."

The waiting period of seven years seems to me to be too long. I think three years should be quite sufficient. Presumably young men were in a hopeless minority in the Select Committee, for young persons alone can realise what it means to waste full seven years of the most precious period of their lives in dry and useless waiting. As mostly young men alone go out of their homes for service, business or war, desert their wives or abscond to avoid arrest, this section will cause great hardship to young wives only. Will the Parsi youths rise in a body to protest against this gross injustice that is going to be perpetrated on Parsi women and agitate to the utmost to get this period reduced to three years? This long period of seven years will land a youth in the twenties married recently to almost middle age at its end, with much reduced chance of securing a suitable match. Furthermore, this period of forced continence will either cause all the numerous harmful effects—both physical and mental—which attend the repression of sex energy and suppression of sex activity, as enumerated by hosts of modern sexologists, or sexual lapses, resulting in obvious scandals, diseases, crimes and social evils.

Section 32 (e) provides that any married person may sue for divorce if the defendant has, since the marriage, infected the plaintiff with venereal disease. Why not nip the evil in the bud by adding a section before Section 6 to the effect that the persons desiring to contract a marriage shall get themselves thoroughly examined by a qualified (i. e., one holding a degree from a recognised Medical School or College) and registered medical practitioner, nominated by the other party, who shall conduct the examination in the same manner and fill up a certificate form similar to that a doctor has to do when examining a person going to insure his own life? Among other matters the certificate should state specifically whether the person is suffering from venereal disease, tuberculosis, epilepsy, insanity, imbecility, impotence, or infantile genitals (i. e., inability to consummate marriage). The women shall have the right to claim to be examined by a lady doctor in case she lives at or near a station where one is available. The doctor's fee shall be paid by the party examined. The medical examination shall be arranged after all other preliminaries had been settled and the marriage had been agreed to. If any party backs out after the medical examination, on any ground except medical, based on the nominated doctors' certificate, he or she shall have to pay the medical fees incurred by the other party.

It should be laid down that the officiating priest shall not solemnise any marriage without receiving these certificates which he shall countersign and forward to the Registrar along with the marriage certificate, as provided in Section 6. The latter shall keep them for ten years.

According to Section 30, "In any case in which consummation of the marriage is, from natural causes, impossible, such marriage may, at the instance of either party thereto, be declared to be null and void." Surely there is no wisdom in contracting a marriage without first ascertaining whether any party is, from natural causes, incapable of consummating marriage, discovering it thereafter, then going to a court to annul it, causing thereby mental shock, waste of money (spent for marriage and litigation) and public scandal for both the parties. The medical examination as suggested above will do away with any such contingency.

Besides, it will be very difficult, even for experienced physicians to make sure in some cases whether actually the defendant or the complainant himself or herself had infected the other party first, as will appear from the following quotations from 'Sex and Love Life' by Dr. William J. Fielding of New York. (16th printing 1933).

"Many men, thinking themselves cured and then marrying, have later infected their wives. This sometimes results in bitter recriminations as well as physical suffering from the disease. It may happen that a man will in this way infect his wife, without experiencing any symptom himself, and she in turn will pass on to him an active or virulent case of gonorrhea. Many a woman has thus been unjustly accused of having contracted the disease before marriage, or of being guilty of infidelity after marriage, and picking up the infection in this way." Page 253. Again fortunately for them, many women have the disease in so mild a form that they are but little inconvenienced, probably not enough to seek medical attention, and have not realised that they were infected with the germs of a destructive disease. In cases of this kind, however, when the disease may be said to be latent, the woman is quite capable of infecting others. While she does not suffer herself, she is a 'carrier' and may give a virulent case to any one whom she infects, either in sexual congress or by spreading the germs on bed clothes, sponges, towels, syringes, etc. P. 256.

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Dec. 21

It is high time that the Hindus, Sikhs, Christians and Muslims too should try to amend their out-of-date marriage laws. But if it is not possible to do so at present, these being very large and heterogeneous groups, the educated, thoughtful and progressive sections thereof should try to get up to date, equitable and eugenic marriage and divorce laws enacted for them. The backward and conservative elements will follow suit in time.

NIRMAL CHANDRA DAY.

HINDU IDEALS OF EDUCATION.*

(BY RABINDRANATH TAGORE)

It is the same all over the world. Here, man has hidden his true welfare behind the veil of antiquated custom; there, in his attempts to grow bigger by acquisition and accumulation, he has allowed his self to eclipse that which is greater than self; everywhere, whether it be by inert slothfulness or by unmeaning activity, he has been lost to the sense of his greatest good.

From its very birth, (and every time it has gained fresh life by shaking off the bonds of orthodoxy,) Hinduism has been characterised by its efforts to rescue itself from the depths of such forgetfulness, to rouse the faculties of man to their greatest power by making men realise themselves in their relation to the Infinite. The unshackled Hindu mind has always proclaimed this freedom of joy as the true object of man's religious striving. And whenever any particular scripture, temple, philosophy or ritual has usurped the place of such grand freedom, it has done so contrary to the spirit of truth and necessarily therefore of true Hinduism.

This much already becomes evident, that religious teaching of this character cannot consist merely in prescribing formulas to be learnt by heart, or rites to be repeated. At the same time, the difficulties due to the absence of that kind of definiteness which comes from outward forms, must not be shirked. We must not allow ourselves to be moved by regretful longing for those facilities of sectarian religion, be it Hindu or any other, which make the problem easier. What is the good of trying to make religion easy? Dust is easy to get, not gold.

Just as health is a condition of man's whole body, so is religion of his whole nature. Health cannot be given in the same way as money is put into one's palm. But it may be induced by bringing about suitable conditions. Religious teaching, likewise, cannot be left to a school committee to be put on their syllabus along with arithmetic and Euclid. No school inspector will be able to measure its progress. No examiner's blue pencil can assign it proper marks. An appropriate environment must be created in which religion may have its natural growth.

Men, who have attained realisation, have themselves told us that the way is not through the intellect, nor vastness of erudition. That is to say, religion is not a thing to be taught and learnt, in the ordinary meaning of those terms. But no great man, up to now, has been able to tell us exactly how he arrived at his enlightenment. Seers have simply exclaimed: I have known Him; those who know Him attain immortality. How He comes to be known is a truth of such intimate mystery, that it is not even patent to the knower. Had any seer been able to disclose the mystery, the problem of religious education would have ceased to exist.

It is true, there have been cases of enlightened men who have advised a definite religious procedure for their disciples. One set of these has said: "Purify your mind: avoid sin: make your inner self worthy of receiving the enlightenment, which shall come from within." Others have counselled the recourse to outward observances. Some of the latter prescribe the performance of rites; some enjoin the repetition of formulas, or meditation on symbolic images. But history has shown us how, whenever the religious effort is thus directed outwards, the door is thrown open to error; the imagination runs riot; the disciple, fascinated by the alluring comfort of lazy credulity, loses his way. Thereupon ensues self-delusion and the deluding of others. Nevertheless, there can be no question that many of those who give such advice have gained truth themselves. It would be wrong to charge them with a deliberate desire to mislead. At the same time, the fact that they have gained realisation for themselves does not preclude their being honestly mistaken. It is one thing to have arrived at enlightenment, and quite another to have a correct analytical idea of the path by which it was reached.

While many wise men recognise this and seek to combat the tendency to make too much of habits, there are others, born and bred therein, who cannot get rid of a certain dependence upon and affection for them. Though, as a matter of fact, the latter have become great only by inwardly transcending such habits, they do not realise that fact. On the contrary, even if they are driven to admit that such popular customs are not essential to a people's spiritual perfection, they persist in justifying them as having been initially useful in the case of their own temperament. The result of this is that lesser men, who have no inborn genius, imagine that they too have achieved greatness because of their adherence to the same customs; they wax intolerant, and cannot concede greatness to be possible where these observances are absent. For them, truth and conformity to custom become one and the same thing.

Attainments, which do not have their origin in external habit, but are the result of the unfolding of the inner nature of man, cannot be gained by artificial methods. They depend on favourable conditions. If religious feeling is not considered a mere sectarian accomplishment, but rather the fulfilment of humanity itself, then it must have a suitable environment for its exercise, and sufficient leisure for its growth. The surrounding light and air must be so ample that the soul may gain fresh life with every breath it draws. This amplitude is what the forest universities of ancient India offered for the spiritual education of her children. The ideal of perfection preached by the forest dwellers of ancient India runs through the heart of our classical literature and still dominates our mind.

The forest Asrama was the sacred abode, where human activity, in cadence with that reposefulness which is in universal nature, mingled in the discipline of man's pure disinterested endeavour. The spirit of the universe and the soul of man united to build up a temple for worship. This worship itself was service, unfettered by the bonds of self-seeking. It is this spiritual unity which was set forth so truly and so purely by the great thinkers and teachers of ancient India in their forest Asramas; and it is this same ideal which we need for our religious growth today.

The religion of the modern time which does not ascribe any particular form to the subject of its worship, nor attributes any special efficacy to particular rites, but rather believes that outward observances carry with them a certain danger to man's intellect as well as to his moral nature,—such religion cannot be expected to keep a permanent hold over the minds of men by the mere preaching of its ideals.

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

The atmosphere of the Asrama is needed if the religious spirit in the modern age is to find its inner harmony and its living power. For, in the Asrama life, such a harmony exists. There are no artificial barriers between men and nature. Men and women and little children come naturally to regard bird and beast, tree and creeper, as their kith and kin. The subtle allurements and endless appurtenances of worldly comforts do not constantly distract the mind. The search after God is not merely an act of meditation, but is continued throughout the daily life in acts of sacrifice and compassion. Conscience is not imprisoned by any personal consideration of expediency. Its urgency is ever towards the higher ideal of universal good as the only final sanction.

There are truths which are of the nature of information, that can be added to our stock of knowledge from the outside. But there are other truths, of the nature of inspiration, which cannot be used to swell the number of our accomplishments. These latter are not like food, but are rather the appetite itself, that can only be strengthened by inducing harmony in our bodily functions. Religion is such a truth. It establishes the right centre for life's activities, giving them an eternal meaning; maintains the true standard of value for the objects of our striving; inspires in us the spirit of renunciation which is the spirit of humanity. It cannot be doled out in regulated measure, nor administered through the academic machinery of education. It must come immediately from the burning flame of spiritual life, in surroundings suitable for such life. The Asrama, the Forest University of ancient India, gave for our country the answer to the question as to how this Religion can be imparted.

It was in the Asrama where the harvest of religious thoughts, reaped in a great period of Indian History, was garnered in the Upanishads. These had nothing to do with any institution; they never harboured any creeds, nor built rigid walls round them of logical consistency; and therefore people brought up in the atmosphere of some sectarian religion consider the texts contained in them merely as so many seeds of religious philosophy. But there can be no doubt that these seeds came out of the fruit of a true life of religion, fully lived. Such religion contains the true spirit of liberation in its essence of spiritual truth because it is free from the bondage of sect.

SECOND INTERNATIONAL CONGRESS OF THE WORLD FELLOWSHIP, LONDON.

The Second International Congress of the World Fellowship of Faiths will be held in London, in July, 1936. Outstanding representatives of the great faiths of Persia, India, China, Japan, Europe, Australasia, America, and other lands will be called together—to give men an idea of the direction which the human race should take and of the world-order after which it should strive.

The First International Congress of the World Fellowship of Faiths, which was held in U. S. A. in 1933-34, was guided in its activities by the three governing ideas of:—

1. Working for fellowship;
2. Welcoming the necessary differences among fellows in any fellowship;
3. Uniting the inspiration of all Faiths upon the solution of man's present problems.

The British National Council, in organizing the Second Congress to be held in London from July 3rd to July 18th, 1936, would accept these ideas as their guiding principles, but would wish the attention of the Second Congress to be concentrated upon the solution of one specific problem, leaving subsequent Congresses to deal with other problems. And the subject it has chosen for discussion is:—

Fellowship implies unity, and the sense of fellowship is latent in every man—of fellowship with his fellow-men, and of kinship with all living things and with the whole universe. But what is merely latent needs first to be positively realized and then intensified till it is consummated in beneficent action. For, until the unity is actualized, the equally fundamental diversity of men is apt to bring them into harmful conflict rather than enlightening contrast. So the Congress will focus its efforts upon emphasizing the fundamental unity.

The main hindrances to the establishment of any worldwide, or any intimate fellowship between men of different faiths, and of different races, nationalities and ways of looking at things, may be stated as:—

- (a) Fear, suspicion, hatred and other forms of spiritual instability which lead to wars between nations and conflicts between individuals;
- (b) Nationalism in excess or defect;
- (c) Racial Antagonism and Race Domination;
- (d) Religious Differentiation;
- (e) Class Domination;
- (f) Poverty;
- (g) Ignorance;

How these obstacles to forming any true fellowship can be overcome, whether it be by the aid of:—

- (a) Education (literary, scientific, philosophic, or religious);
- (b) Improved economic conditions;
- (c) Drama, music or other forms of art;
- (d) The examples of saintly and heroic lives held up for emulation;
- (e) Prayer;
- (f) Concentrated meditation on the supremely perfect things in life;
- (g) Sharing spiritual experiences;
- (h) Common pursuit of Truth, common enjoyment of Beauty, common worship of a God common to all mankind, common deeds of Charity, or by any other means will be the one problem before the Congress.

To help in finding a solution of the selected problem, representative spokesmen of the leading Faiths of the world will be invited to deliver addresses open to discussion to the Congress. Every such spokesman will not be expected to deal with all the above-mentioned hindrances, or with all the suggested aids to overcoming them. Each will be invited to deal only with that particular one, or with those few, with which he feels himself most competent to deal. But taken together these addresses should give a good basis for the discussion of the problem. And, to make the discussion the more fruitful in results, the twenty selected writers would be asked to have them ready by January, 1936, so that they might be published as a collection and be available for the use of members well before the Congress assemblies. Groups could then meet in preparation for the Congress and discuss the problem. At the Congress itself, besides the hour allotted for the formal debate of each of the twenty addresses, opportunities would be afforded for further informal group discussion. And at the final meeting of the Congress the results of the debate would be summed up by some competent person.

Then, besides these addresses (followed by discussion) on the solution of one of man's present problems, six addresses by a Confucian, a Hindu, a Buddhist, a Jew, a Christian and a Muslim, respectively, will be delivered at two public meetings on "The Supreme Spiritual Ideal." These will not be followed by discussion. But, as in the case of the other series of addresses, a summing up of the main conclusions will be made at the final meeting of the Congress. As a result there may, perhaps, emerge some common ideal after which humanity is now faintly groping and towards which it may more consciously strive in future.

By these two means we should hope to obtain a valuable conspectus of opinion as to how the spirit of World Fellowship may best be promoted.

But something further may be expected. During the progress of the Congress itself the sense of fellowship should all the time be developing. For, previous to each meeting, a short devotional service will be conducted by a representative of one of the great religions—on one day by a Hindu, on another by a Jew, on a third by a Christian, on a fourth by a Muslim, and so on. The meeting for a common object—and that the highest possible—should in itself engender such a spirit of fellowship among the assembled spiritual leaders of the world as will gradually leaven the whole body of mankind, and there work till it finally eventuates in deeds of lasting benefit to the race and to every single member of it in his own individual, personal, and most intimate life.

Patriotism, nationalism, racialism may indeed, continue—but continue only as they all allow themselves to be included in and transcended by an all-embracing love of humanity. The nation, or race, will regard not itself alone: it will work for that wider whole, the whole of humanity, in which it is included as a component part.

And the fellowship we would have in view would be something profounder than what is usually spoken of as the Brotherhood of man. Brotherhood suggests a mere blood-relationship. The fellowship intended is essentially a thing of the spirit founded on a sense of kinship with the divine. It is a divine fellowship—a fellowship of the Holy Spirit. For each of us is in some degree a manifestation of God—most in very small degree, a few in very high degree, but all in some. And in all the glow of the divine is capable of being stirred into blazing, fervent flame.

To create this Divine Fellowship is the high adventure into which we all—both young and old, Christian and non-Christian—will now throw our best energies. It is the one great need of the world—the final solution of every problem. Given a Divine fellowship between nations as between individuals and all else follows. That, therefore, it is for which, above all else, we will work. That it is, and that alone, which will bring joy and serenity to the world—and great peace at the last.

Among the many supporters in Great Britain of the Second International Congress of the World Fellowship of Faiths are:—

ORTHODOX OF ALL RELIGIONS, UNITE*

Nearly twenty-two years ago, before the War, in January, 1914, the Aga Khan wrote an article in the Edinburgh Review on the Indian situation. He advised the Government to abandon the policy of separating Hindus from Muslims and to rally the moderate of both creeds in a common camp so as to provide a counterpoise to the radical nationalist tendencies of young India, both Hindu and Muslim. In those days extremism was confined to nationalism and did not go beyond the political plane. Even so the Aga Khan sensed that the vital division lay not along religious lines but along political—between those who more or less stood for British domination in India and others who desired to end it. That nationalist issue still dominates the field and is likely to do so as long as India remains politically unfree. But today other issues have also assumed prominence—social and economic. If radical political change was feared by the moderate and socially backward elements, much more are they terrified by the prospect of social and economic change. Indeed it is the fear of the latter that has reacted on the political issue and made many a so-called advanced politician retrace his steps. He has in some cases become frankly a reactionary in politics, or a camouflaged reactionary like the communalists, or an open champion of his class interests and vested rights, like the big Zamindars and taluquaders and industrialists.

I have no doubt that this process will continue and will lead to the toning down of communal and religious animosities, to Hindu Muslim unity—of a kind. The communalists of various groups in spite of their mutual hostility, will embrace each other like long lost brothers and swear fealty in a new joint campaign against those who are out for radical change, politically or socially or economically. The new alignment will be a healthier one and the issues will be clearer. The indications towards some such grouping are already visible, though they will take some time to develop.

Sir Mohamad Iqbal, the champion of the solidarity of Islam, is in cordial agreement with orthodox Hindus in some of their most reactionary demands. He writes: "I very much appreciate the orthodox Hindus' demands for protection against religious reformers in the new constitution. Indeed this demand ought to have been first made by the Muslims." He further explains that "the encouragement in India of religious adventurers on the ground of modern liberalism tends to make people more and more indifferent to religion and will eventually and completely eliminate the important factor of religion from the life of the Indian community. The Indian mind will then seek some other substitute for religion which is likely to be nothing less than the form of atheistic materialism which has appeared in Russia."

This fear of communism has driven many liberals and other middle groups in Europe to fascism and reaction. Even the old enemies, the Jesuits and the Freemasons, have covered up their bitter hostility of two hundred years to face the common enemy. In India communism and socialism are understood by relatively very few persons and most people who shout loudest against them are supremely ignorant about them. But they are influenced partly instinctively because of their vested interests, and partly because of the propaganda on the part of Government, which always stresses the religious issue.

Sir Mohamed Iqbal's argument, however, takes us very much further than merely anti-communism or anti-socialism and it is worthwhile examining it in some detail. His position, on this issue of suppression of all reformers, is, it should be remembered, almost the same as that of the Sanatanist Hindus. And even a party which presumes to call itself Democratic or Nationalist (or perhaps some other name—it is difficult to keep pace with the periodic transformations of half-a dozen worthy gentlemen in Western India) declared recently in its programme that it was opposed to all legislative interference with religious rights and customs. In India this covers a wide field and there are few departments of life which cannot be connected with religion. Not to interfere with them legislatively is a mild way of saying that the orthodox may continue in every way as before and no changes will be permitted.

Sir Mohamad would go further for Islam; according to him, it does not believe in tolerance. Its solidarity consists in a certain uniformity which does not permit any heresy or non-conformity within the fold. Hinduism is utterly different because, in spite of a common culture and outlook, it lacks uniformity and for thousands of years has actually encouraged the formation of innumerable sects. It is difficult to define heresy when almost every conceivable variation of the central theme is held by some sect. This outlook of Islam is probably comparable to that of the Roman Catholic Church; both think in terms of a world community owning allegiance to one definite doctrine and are not prepared to tolerate any deviation from it. A person belonging to an entirely different religion is preferable to a heretic, for a heretic creates confusion in the minds of true believers. Therefore a heretic must be shown no quarter and his ideas must be suppressed. That, essentially, has always been, and still is, the belief of the Catholic Church, but its practice, has been toned down to meet modern 'liberal' notions. When the practice fitted in with the theory it led to the Spanish Inquisition, the autos da fe, and various crusades and wars against Christian non-conformists in Europe. The Inquisition has a bad odour now and we shiver to think of its cruelties. Yet it was carried on by high-minded, deeply religious men who never thought of personal gain. They believed with all the intensity of religious conviction that the heretic would go to hell if he persisted in his error, and with all their might they sought to save his immortal soul from the eternal pit. What did it matter if in this attempt the body was made to suffer?

I wonder how far Sir Mohamed Iqbal would accept Cardinal Newman's dictum, applying it to Islam of course. I imagine that quite a large number of both Hindus and Muslims would agree with the Cardinal, each thinking in terms of his own religion. Indeed I should say that most truly religious people belonging to almost any organized religion would agree with him. Personally I entirely disagree with him because my outlook is not that of religion. But I think I can dimly understand the religious outlook and to some extent even appreciate it. Granting the supreme importance of certain dogmas and beliefs the rest seems to follow. If I am absolutely convinced that a thing is evil, it is absurd to talk of tolerating it. It must be suppressed, removed, liquidated. If I believe that this world is a snare and a delusion and the only reality is the next world, then the question of progress or change here below hardly arises. Because I have no such absolute convictions, and the beliefs I hold in matters of theological and metaphysical religion are negative rather than positive, I can easily pose as a 'tolerant' individual. It costs me nothing in mental suppression or anguish. It is far more difficult for me to be tolerant about other matters relating to this world in regard to which I hold positive opinions. But even then the opinion has not got the intensity of religious belief and so I am not likely to favour inquisitorial methods for the suppression of opinions and beliefs I consider harmful. Not being interested in the other world, whatever it may be, I judge largely by the effects I observe in this world. I am unable therefore to find a supernatural sanction for inflicting cruelty, physical or mental, here below. Perhaps also most of us of the modern world (Fascists and Hitlerites excluded) are far more squeamish in the matter of causing pain or even watching it with unconcern than our stout old ancestors were.

Thus we make a virtue of our indifference and call it tolerance, just as the British Government takes credit for impartiality and neutrality in matters of religion when in reality it is supremely indifferent to them so long as its secular interests are not touched. But there is no shadow of toleration when its administration is criticized or condemned. That is sedition, to be expiated by long years of prison.

Sir Mohamad Iqbal could thus like to have, so far as Muslims are concerned, a strict uniformity and conformity enforced by the power of the State. But who would lay down the common standard which was to be followed? Would there be a kind of permanent commission of the Jamiat-ul-Ulema advising the secular arm, as the Roman Church used to advise the princes of Europe in the days of its temporal glory? Sir Mohamad, however, does not seem to approve of the present generation of Moulvies and Ulemas. He says that "in the modern world of Islam ambitious and ignorant mullaism, taking advantage of modern Press, has shamelessly attempted to hurl the old pre-Islamic Magian outlook at the face of the twentieth century." On the other hand he expresses his sorrowful contempt for the "so-called 'enlightened' Muslims" who "have gone to the extent of preaching 'tolerance' to their brethren in faith."

The election or nomination of a competent authority to interpret the ecclesiastical law under modern conditions will be no easy matter, and it is well known that even the pious and the orthodox often disagree amongst themselves. Orthodoxy ultimately becomes one's own doxy, and the other person's doxy is heterodoxy.

If such an authority is established it will deal presumably with the Muslims alone. But Islam is a proselytising religion and questions touching other faiths will frequently arise. Even now doubtful cases arise, especially relating to girls and women who, with little thought of religion, marry a Muslim or elope with him or are abducted by him. If they slide back from the strict path of the faith are they to be subjected to the terrible punishment for apostasy?

PEACEFUL CHANGE.*

(BY JIRI F. VRANEK, B.A., PH.D.)

It may seem, perhaps, out of place, or at any rate premature, to speak of Peaceful Change at a time when the press informs us daily of a war in progress in Africa, of clashes between the frontier forces of two great Powers in Asia, of the possible renewal of hostilities in South America, and of the inevitability of a conflagration in Europe. Yet all these conflicts and the show of violence are the result of much deeper causes which threaten to prevent orderly relations between states, such as we were led to hope for during the last sixteen years. It is true that the question of sanctions is uppermost in the minds of everybody to-day. But the problem of peaceful change is the problem of the future—if there is to be any future for our civilisation at all. Sanctions may restore international peace now, but only a process of peaceful change can prepare a permanent peace by establishing orderly international relations. These relations will not be necessarily peaceful, but orderly. We must therefore clear our minds of the confusion that still exists on the question of peace and war. The distinction between peace and war seems to be an obvious one—so obvious that it obscures the real issue. From the point of view of relations between states, the difference between peace and war is only one of degree, not of category. A sovereign state, which does not recognise any higher authority, can have no other relations with its neighbours except those of peace or war.

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

But what is Peace? The Oxford English Dictionary informs us that peace is "freedom from war," that it is "cessation of war." This definition logically assumes that peace is something negative, the absence of something more fundamental, namely war. And the same dictionary gives the following definition of war: a "state of open hostility." Again, logical deduction would assume that the other kind of hostility, the subdued hostility, is the more general relationship which usually passes under the name of peace. In the unorganised, anarchical world, therefore, peace and war are only reverse and obverse of the same bad coin, of unorganised relations between states. They are both based upon the will of sovereign states who are their own judges.

The true distinction lies not between peace and war but between an unorganised world in which these are inevitable, and an organised world of states. In such a world there would still be the use of force, not for the selfish ends of one section of the community, but for the preservation of order. The state of peace may then be described as a state of international co-operation, and the state of war as the application of military sanctions. We are forced to use these rather inadequate terms, for international law has not yet developed sufficiently to provide us with better terms.

The establishment of orderly international relations involves another problem. We live in a dynamic world. As human beings, we are part of a process of continuous change. There is no need to stress the importance of the philosophical system of Heraclitus, in which the world is presented as one continuous flux. It is one of the earliest philosophical generalisations and perhaps the most profound one. We see, then, that everything human—even human relationships—are subject to the same laws of change or, to put it more specifically, the natural law of rise and decline. It was a philosopher, not a lawyer, who defined politics as "the art of readjusting institutions to the changing needs of mankind."

Our next question is, why, if everything changes and nothing is static, do we still recognise a difference between evolution and revolution; between peaceful and violent changes? The reason for this lies with man himself and his dual existence, physical and intellectual. While man's body follows the laws of nature, his mind, although subject to change, is yet capable of conceiving the immaterial, the immutable, the eternal. The first impact of man's mind on the outside world is to control it, to stabilise it. That desire for stability is prompted by yet another impulse—the need for the material security of man's existence. That security can be achieved only through man's control of his material environment. By controlling matter he can become more and more independent of it. In order to perpetuate this favourable condition, man's relationship to inanimate objects and to his fellow beings alike must be regularised and stabilised. The highest expression of this process is the creation of the State—an institution which by its very etymology suggests something static, unalterable. Within that institution, man's relations are embodied in a system of laws. Laws, however, and all institutions within the State, must be adjusted from time to time to the changing needs of the society. This is done by politics, through the medium of the legislative powers of the government. Laws are the expression of certain relationships at a given time. But the continuing operation of these same laws under changed circumstances results in injustice. We are familiar with this phenomenon. Laws usually lag behind conditions, because the machinery for their adjustment works slowly. In democracies the process involves the persuasion and conviction of either a majority of the electorate, or, at any rate, the majority of their representatives in the legislative body. This method of changing the laws of a State is an entirely respectable, constitutional process. It is carried on openly by individuals, societies, political parties—some of them disinterested, others with an ulterior motive. Reformers in democratic countries are sometimes looked upon as impractical idealists, but, for all their desire to change the law, they are not regarded as law-breakers.

In the international sphere the situation is entirely different. The legal system which regulates the relations between states is embodied in international treaties. Until recently in theory, and in practice even to-day, each sovereign state is the sole judge of its actions. Consequently it must rely only on the force of arms to carry out its policies. The existing rights of states are also based upon force, and are therefore established by those treaties which establish the relation of these forces, namely, by peace treaties. Peace treaties are the result of an armed conflict, and perpetuate in a legal form the "status quo" of the moment. Peace treaties are contractual obligations. It matters not whether they have been concluded voluntarily or "under duress." As they are the expression of a given state of relations, and as those relations are based on force, the more or less ethical problem of "will" does not enter into consideration.

But we are concerned with another character of peace treaties. They are perpetual. Their validity has no time-limit. When, therefore, circumstances change—when the relations based upon a certain balance of forces is altered in the purely natural way of an organic growth—then the demand for change becomes irresistible. There is, however, no organisation in the international sphere to which a State could appeal under such circumstances. There is no international government, no international parliament. There is no possibility of changing peace treaties by such methods as are used for changing the laws of a country.

PANDIT JAWAHARLAL AND BENGAL GOVERNMENT.

With reference to Paragraph 18 in Bengal Government Administration Report for 1934-35 in which Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru was accused of carrying revolutionary activities in the guise of anti-untouchability activities and with Harijan Funds Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru has sent the following statement to the press in India: "A friend has just drawn my attention to the following paragraph appearing in Bengal Government's Administration Report for 1934-35. "During the third week of January Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru paid a short visit to Calcutta and after consultation with leaders of most of the subversive movements in Bengal prescribed a militant programme based mainly on his own extreme socialist views and designed primarily to attract the peasant masses. This agitation was to be carried on under the guise of anti-untouchability activities and with the money" collected for Harijan work. He was eventually prosecuted before the Chief Presidency Magistrate in respect of three violent speeches. The Pandit did not defend himself beyond attempting to deliver a further seditious speech from the dock and was sentenced to two years simple imprisonment on 16th February."

This paragraph contains a number of errors and insinuations but realising, as I do, that the Bengal Government and I are as poles apart in regard to ideas and outlook it would serve little purpose for me to argue these matters with them. But there is one specific statement in it, that I was attempting to carry on an agitation under false cloak of anti-untouchability activities and with money collected for Harijan work which I cannot in fairness to my colleagues in Bengal Harijan Seva Sangh and myself allow to pass uncontradicted. The statement is an absolute falsehood which neither had nor could have had the shadow of a foundation. Whatever else I might be guilty of I hope that I have never indulged in duplicity in my work. A definite and unequivocal statement having been made by Sir John Anderson's Government in Bengal and having been contradicted by me it is desirable in the interests of public morals for them either to justify it or to withdraw it publicly and express regret for it.

There are certain things which are not done by decent people, and if an error is committed an apology is forthcoming. An error in my case may not matter much, for the opinions that my countrymen form of me are not based on Bengal Government's views on the subject. But a Government has the tremendous power of the State's apparatus of coercion behind it and its errors are likely to affect the lives and liberties of vast numbers of people.

ENGLISH PRESS OPINIONS.

A special cable to the "Hindu" says:—Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru, in a letter to "The Manchester Guardian," vigorously repudiates the passage in the Bengal Administration Report describing his visit to Calcutta and attributing to him the prescribing of "an agitation to be carried on under the guise of anti-untouchability activities, with money collected for Harijan work." Pandit Nehru characterizes this as an amazing and astounding lie without the shadow of a foundation and says he cannot allow such a falsehood to go unchallenged in fairness to the Harijan Seva Sangh. Pandit Nehru adds: "I have many failings but I hope duplicity is not among them."

Editorially, "The Manchester Guardian" hopes that the attention of H. E. Sir John Anderson will be called to Pandit Nehru's protest and adds, "It is immaterial whether Pandit Nehru disclaims subversive activities, but when it is a question of misappropriation of the untouchables' funds, other considerations arise, as the Pandit comes from a family, distinguished for patriotism culture and a fine sense of honour." "Such things may occasionally creep into administration reports, but our faith in the trustworthiness of such publications would be partially revived if the charge against Pandit Nehru were either substantiated or expunged."

The "New Statesman" commenting on the communication from Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru wherein he refers to a passage in the Bengal Administration Report of 1934-35, in the course of which he is accused, during his visit to Calcutta, of advocating that a programme of agitation should be carried out on a false pretext with funds collected for quite other purposes, agrees with his demand that in the interests of public morals, the statement should either be justified or publicly withdrawn. The paper adds that the Governor of Bengal ought not to hit below the belt or be suspected thereof.

NOTES

A Beacon of Hope:—The categorical repudiation of the Hoare-Laval proposals for ending the Italo-Ethiopian War by the British Government and the enforced resignation of the British Foreign Secretary responsible for them, are an unprecedented departure from British tradition. For a parallel commentators who are interested in precedents have had to go a long way back in English history. These events have to us in India a deeper interest than the fate of Ethiopia. They restore to some extent the belief, which Indians cherished for long, that the British people are at heart lovers of justice and fair play and that they would not tolerate wrong if they were not misled by political subterfuge. More than that, these events have restored to many their wavering faith in the Divine ordering of the Universe and the supremacy of the moral law. The part played by Sir Samuel Hoare in this discreditable episode is in character with the Indian constitutional reform with which his name will be associated. Apart from the scheme itself, his attitude towards educated British Indians and their opinion, revealed the true nature of the man. There are some things which should be forgiven but cannot be forgotten.

India and the Rejected Proposals:—The Hindu, which is not apt to nurse petty grievances, begins its leading article on Sir Samuel Hoare's resignation by recalling his famous saying about caravans and dogs. It is clear, it adds, that Sir Samuel put forward his so-called peace proposals in the same spirit in which he offered the India Bill to the British and Indian public—take it or leave it. The Hindustan Times points out that this was not Sir Samuel's first commitment as Foreign Minister which had to be repudiated by the British Government. His declaration in his Guildhall speech about the Egyptian constitution of 1923, was not publicly repudiated but was quietly over-ruled by the British Minister in Egypt being instructed to inform the Egyptian Government that His Majesty's Government did not oppose the restoration of the 1923 constitution. Mr. Baldwin said in the House of Commons that the leakage of the Laval-Hoare proposals in France made impossible any other course but an open repudiation of them and the consequent dropping out of Sir Samuel Hoare from the Cabinet. To take liberties with India, does not involve any immediate risks and may be tolerated. But the Foreign Office is a dangerous sphere and while it is probable that Sir Samuel's career is only interrupted, it will be many years before he is entrusted again with the foreign portfolio.

National Congress Jubilee:—Fifty years ago today the Indian National Congress met for the first time in the premises of the Gokuldas Tejpal High School, in this city. The occasion is to be commemorated this evening in the same premises. It is a happy idea of the President of the Bombay Congress Committee to invite men and women of all shades of politics to gather together to express their felicitations on the attainment of its fiftieth year by this historic institution. The enthusiasm created by Lord Ripon's administration gave the first impulse to the establishment of an annual Assembly representing the aims and aspirations of United India. Lord Dufferin, who succeeded Lord Ripon, suggested to Allan Octavian Hume the desirability of having an All India organisation to which Government can look for an authentic expression of Indian opinion on questions relating to the administration. The National Congress was thus started as more or less an auxiliary to Government. As its criticism became effective and extended to policy, Government ceased to regard it as an auxiliary and began to treat it as a hostile movement. Within the Congress itself, two currents of thought manifested themselves, first, faintly, then with increasing force and volume. The main body of the Congress represented by the leaders, accepted British rule as a process in Indian evolution and their criticisms were directed to accelerate its pace. An energetic minority chiefly from Maharashtra and Bengal, on the other hand, stressed the alien character of British rule and favoured a nationalism which would be self-contained and self-directed by natives of the country.

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Dec. 28

Surat and After :—The concussion between the two ideas first showed itself in the attempt, five years after the birth of the Congress, to dissociate it from the sister organisation, the National Social Conference, on account of differences on the right of the British Indian Government to initiate social legislation. The minority continued to gain strength and was able to create the split at Surat in 1903. On the death of the two great leaders, Sir Pherozeshah Mehta and Gokhale, both in the year, 1915, the control of the Congress passed out of the hands of those who continued to hold the old creeds. Nevertheless, the old ideas did not completely cease to influence the policy of the Congress until the death of Mr. Tilak, at the moment when the issue of non-co-operation hung in the balance, shifted the Congress completely out of its old moorings. Divergent as these phases seem on the surface, they are all to be regarded as stages through which the Indian people became alive to their destiny as a nation and to the difficulties which beset the path to its realisation. There is no use of and no room for recrimination. All have contributed to the development of the national consciousness. The country has reason to be proud of the National Congress. The time is opportune to remove the restrictions unconnected with politics, which prevent many people from joining the Congress. The party system of parliamentary politics has become discredited even in the land where it produced in the past signal results. In India, too, we should aim at forming a national party and, indeed, there is greater reason to do so here than in Great Britain. We trust that the Jubilee celebrations will pave the way towards this most desirable end.

The Central Educational Advisory Board :—After the inaugural oration of Sir Girja Bajpai, which is the subject of our leading article, a heavy curtain descended upon the proceedings of the Central Educational Advisory Board at Delhi. Enterprising newspaper correspondents communicated to their journals, as the result of their attempts to peer through the fog, that the discussions revealed strong differences of opinion in composing which Sir Girja who presided had to exercise all his tact, patience and ingenuity. The Press communique issued by the Board, the substance of which is reprinted elsewhere, fully confirms this surmise. It contains the text of the principal resolution passed by the Board almost concealed in a lengthy exegesis telling the reader what it all means. The resolution is a hotchpotch of all the suggestions recently made in Convocation and other addresses. The University representatives strongly resented interference on the part of the Board. The resolution, therefore, concerns itself chiefly with secondary education and proposes to make itself contained, whatever that may mean. The fundamental error of this idea, is that the three principal stages of education correspond to the pupil's stages of mental growth, the elementary to the child mind, the secondary, to the period between childhood and adolescence, and the higher to adolescence when the intellectual and spiritual faculties are verging to maturity; and they cannot be kept distinct because childhood, youth and manhood run into one another and cannot be kept distinct from one another. The primary stage can not be carried further than 12 years of age and what are the jobs which await the thousands of lads whose education, according to some recent suggestions, is finally and irrevocably to end there? The compulsory school age is being advanced in other countries as one means of relieving the Labour market. Here, on the contrary, we try deliberately to "divert" young people from schools as a part of a scheme to find jobs for the jobless.

More Experts :—In order to carry out this fantastic transformation some experts are to be brought out from Britain whose economic and educational conditions are the complete antitheses in every respect of those of India. The English educational system is adapted to the needs of a small, over-industrialised country which, in order to assure its manufactures of raw material on the one hand and a market for their products, is obliged, whether it likes it or not, to hold and administer a vast colonial Empire in conditions of what has been aptly termed "economic servitude." The British educational system has, for its main object, the turning out of personnel for "colonial administration." India, on the other hand, wants educated men to carry out the ordinary duties of life in a society which is assailed from many sides by divergent forces and which has to face them all at the same time, while her power of resistance is weakened by economic and political subjection. The English experts can not therefore help India to solve her educational problem. But the importation of these experts seems to be the only tangible result of the joint Board's deliberations. The shelves of the Government of India and the Provinces are groaning under the load of reports of Experts on all conceivable subjects and the four horsemen of the new Educational Apocalypse will write a Report which, in due time, will find a place in this honourable and dusty region.

Hindu Social Evolution :—The learned article which we publish today on the vicissitudes of the law of Succession among Hindus may be found stiff reading by several of our readers. It is, however, important for more reasons than one. In the first place, our learned contributor belongs to one of the foremost orthodox Sri Vaishnava families of Southern India and the perfectly objective manner in which he discusses the motives of the great Rishis who are regarded as inspired authorities on Hindu law, shows that Hindu orthodoxy at its best is untrammelled by the scrupulosities of the professional priesthood. Secondly, the article completely disproves the fond belief of the average Hindu that all the laws and customs to which he is subject, are identical with

realpatidar.com

259

those observed by his Vedic forbears in the pre-historic past. Thirdly, Mr. Tatachariar boldly affirms and clearly shows that the Hindu law owes its liberalisation, still far from finished, particularly in regard to women's rights of property, to Dravidian influence, Aryan policy not recognising any rights in their favour. The old theory that India was a land of primitives before the Aryan conquest, is crumbling in the light of the knowledge which is accumulating from the study of ancient remains by archaeologists. Even in the realm of religious philosophy the great Acharyas, Sankara and Ramanuja, both Southerners, owed a great deal to their Dravidian Gurus and they have acknowledged their obligation. Ramanuja, in particular, incorporated much from Dravidian sources into his teachings and religious organisation and he made Tamil a second sacred language side by side with Sanskrit. Tatachariar, as a direct inheritor of his tradition, insists on the debt which Hindu law and custom owe to Dravidian inspiration.

Belief in Jesus and Baptism :—Perhaps the greatest of Christian Missionary educationists who served in this country was Dr. William Miller whose name will ever be associated with the Madras Christian College. He held that the diffusion of Christian ideals was the main task of Missions and proselytisation was a mistake, as it obstructed such diffusion. O. Kandaswami Chettiar was one of his favourite pupils. Kandaswami was greatly influenced by Dr. Miller not only in respect of ideas but also in regard to outward manner. He has throughout been a devotee of Jesus Christ. He believes in the divinity of Jesus. Probably, he also believes that the Jesus incarnation is unique and has had and will have no parallel. In all the beliefs which constitute a Christian he is one. But he has not become a convert. He has not undergone baptism. He has remained a Hindu in all outward things. He still wears a dhoti, a long buttoned-up coat and a turban. His household arrangements are just those of any other educated Hindu. Recently at a friendly gathering of Christians near Madras, at which he was present, the position of believing in Jesus but refraining from baptism, seems to have been the topic of discussion. The majority view would seem to have been that the position was anomalous and belief in Jesus should go hand in hand with baptism into one of the sects of Christianity.

Mr. Kandaswami Protests :—In his letter which we print in another column, addressed to the Convenor of the Red Hills gathering, Mr. G. Solomon, Kandaswami vigorously combats this conclusion. He points out that Quakers and Salvationists do not baptise and they are certainly Christians. Belief in Jesus has no logical connection with baptism. The true test of belief is behaviour—the conduct which issues from it. Baptism is a superimposed ceremony. Many baptised Christians, indeed, the majority, show little trace of Christian behavior, which shows that baptism is something superficial, a form, not a state of mind. While we think with Kandaswami that it is intolerable that every one who believes in Jesus should be baptised or submit to be called a moral coward, we also think that it is wrong to judge Hinduism by the behaviour of the mass of Hindus while attaching to Christianity an idealistic, Sermon on the Mount, meaning which few Christians understand, fewer less practice. Speaking generally, Christianity, while it has produced exceptionally fine types of individual men and women, has been far less effective to influence the mass mind than Islam, Buddhism and Hinduism. Individuals who believe in Jesus, therefore, may well hesitate to identify themselves communally with a population consisting predominantly, of mass converts. Few Missionaries themselves do so.

Hindu Mahasabha :—The seventeenth session of the Hindu Mahasabha meets today in Poona under the presidentship of Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya. The Chairman of the Reception Committee is Mr. N. C. Kelkar who was closely associated with Mr. Tilak in his journalistic and political activities and has written a very readable biography of him. The present session is important in that even publicists who used to treat the Hindu Mahasabha as beneath notice have come to recognise that it alone can deal with certain problems which have proved intractable to political methods. We are glad Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya has agreed to preside notwithstanding his recent poor health. There were some differences which, for some time, prevented the Pandit from taking direct part in the Sabha. They have evidently been got out of the way. We earnestly trust that this session of the Mahasabha will put aside minor issues and concentrate on the essential need of Hindu society, namely, vigorous propaganda for the removal of many popular misconceptions of Hindu religion and its promulgation in its purity and simplicity as set forth in the Bhagavad Gita which is recognised as authoritative by all sects. The Sabha would be wasting its opportunity if it spent its time in discussing the Communal Award or Dr. Ambedkar's ultimatum. The Nemesis which watches over human affairs has overtaken the author of that Award. "I never have seen a man so near collapse," said the driver of the train in which Mr. Ramsay MacDonald travelled to London after the polling in his constituency. The Award will remain on the statute book but it will be deprived of its power to do harm if Hindus cease to be afraid of it and believe in themselves. As for Dr. Ambedkar's challenge, it is really a challenge to Hinduism to reform itself and the Sabha can best meet it by starting a propaganda such as we have suggested. So long as this work remains unattempted, piecemeal reforms are only possible and they are never certain or durable.

[Dec 28]

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER
BOMBAY, December 28, 1935.

SIR G. S. BAJPAI ON THE EDUCATIONAL BOARD

Addressing the graduates of Patna University a few days ago Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru observed that the one danger which he foresaw under the new constitution was that education being a provincial subject, Indian universities and the entire educational system in each province might tend from a national point of view to become far too provincial or parochial. This admission by one of the architects of the new constitution, should carry great weight with the public and all who, in any measure, are in a position to influence opinion in moulding future policy. Sir Girja Shankar Bajpai, acting Member for Education of the Government of India, on the other hand, declared, in his speech inaugurating the Central Board of Education at New Delhi last week, that one might as well attempt an educational pan-Europe as to centralise educational initiative and control in India. This was an unfortunate analogy; unfortunate not only in its application to education but, worse still, in its implications over the whole range of Indian nationalism. The centralisation which the Hon. Education Member regards as unthinkable has actually existed since the time when an educational system was adopted in British India; particularly in University education which was governed by statutes of the Imperial Legislature until the introduction of the Montagu-Chelmsford reforms fifteen years ago. Even now the Benares Hindu and Aligarh Muslim Universities are under the direct control of the Central Government. Whatever results the Indian educational system has achieved, it has achieved under centralisation; while the provincialisation of education has, in the opinion of competent observers, not only lowered the standard but has also retarded the pace of educational expansion. Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru's fear that the provincialisation of education may lead to its becoming parochial is only too well founded. For our part, we would have liked University education at least to have remained a central subject. But the die is cast. The question is, what can be done now to counteract the tendencies to provincialism and parochialism which are sure to be let loose by the new constitution. Is the Central Board of Education inaugurated last week, likely to prove effective for the purpose? The Board is not a new device. It was tried soon after the introduction of the Montagu-Chelmsford reforms and it was discarded after a year or two. The provinces of British India alone were then concerned. Under the new constitution, they will be legally independent of the Central Government. And there are now the States also in the picture. Are they likely to be more amenable to a Board at New Delhi even for the limited purpose defined by Sir Girja Shankar Bajpai?

He defined the main function of the Central Advisory Board to be "to test, sift, and cohere the current educational thoughts of the day and impart to what may result from such creative effort the lasting impulse of progressive policy." Sir Girja Shankar had no doubt some definite picture of this process before his mind when he formulated this object but we may be forgiven for not being able to see in it more than a cloud of words. There is nothing "creative" in testing, sifting and cohering current educational thoughts. The operations indicated are rather of a mechanical character. They can be performed quite as well by the Provinces themselves and should be.

Young people on the threshold of life eagerly look to their elders, who have risen to the higher rungs of life's ladder, for words of hope, encouragement, good cheer. What do they get? Said Sir Girja Shankar, "Educated men are unemployed; many of them show an invincible disinclination for any work other than the drudgeries of literacy, a pathetic incapacity for even moderate proficiency in that mechanical pursuit, a tragic lack of aptitude for anything else." This is surely too sweeping to be correct as a character-sketch of Indian youth. Employment and unemployment do not by any means constitute a test of character or capacity. In many cases they are due to causes beyond the control of individuals. But the other items in Sir Girja Shankar's indictment, are much too serious to be passed over. Every one must, of course, judge from the samples which he has happened to come across. Sir Girja Shankar has, no doubt, come across types such as those described in the words quoted. But we too have come across quite a number of educated young men and women, and we have no hesitation in saying—indeed we feel bound to say—that his description is incorrect, unfair and indefensible as a general proposition. We say that the younger generation of educated Indians is, as a class, more resourceful in dealing with situations, less calculating in responding to the call of an ideal, more straightforward, more capable, more ready to make sacrifices, to incur responsibilities, to face the world as men and women who have a work to do without asking any body's leave, more truthful, faithful, more steadfast, in every way better than their predecessors. Their very independence is one cause of unemployment in several cases within our knowledge. We write with some feeling because Sir Girja Shankar occupies a great official position and his estimate of the younger generation cannot but affect their future. It should not, therefore, be allowed to go without emphatic contradiction, much as we respect Sir Girja Shankar's ability and accomplishments. After all, every administration, every business, even every pastime requires vast "drudgeries of literacy" to keep it going nowadays. If the clerks in a Department or Store or Industry struck work for a day, the machinery would come to a standstill; while if the bosses stayed away to attend horse races or cricket matches, the wheels will continue to revolve as if nothing happened. If educated men are not willing to drudge as clerks on small salaries for long hours, Government will have to conscript them for the purpose. Otherwise the administration would collapse like a house of cards. It is for employers, who will be helpless but for these literate "drudges," to see that the work is not more soul-killing than it need be and that the workers are provided with amenities to lighten their drudgery.

We realise fully that something effective has to be done to counteract the tendencies apprehended by Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru. The only way that we can think of is to start a great post-graduate Research University to which the best brains from Indian and foreign universities will be attracted by ample facilities for original work in all departments of knowledge. Such an institution will automatically set the standard for every University and College in the land. Incidentally, the field of employment for educated men and women will also be enlarged. To make employment the end of educational reform will lower the standard but may not appreciably reduce unemployment. One thing more has to be borne in mind. Reduction of facilities either by curtailing admission or closing institutions will injure immediately and primarily the backward classes who are just emerging from their apathy to education. The literary classes will educate their children because to do so has to them the force of a religious duty. But the masses who have hitherto remained unlettered and who do not yet appreciate the value of education, will find it difficult to educate their children, even more than they do now, if in all the stages there is not a large and steady increase in the number of schools and colleges. We want not fewer but more schools and colleges and a greater variety of them.

Women and War:—That the Open Door (Reformer December 14) ideal is gaining ground is shown by Madame Ellen Horup in an article on "War and Women" in the current Calcutta Review. She writes:—"In Sweden for example a movement has been started: the women's unarmed revolt against war. Its first move is directed towards protection from gas. Here it has taken up the only right standpoint on a humane basis: We will not be protected if all cannot be protected. "If we save 50 out of a hundred we are plentifully rewarded for our trouble," says the French General Superintendent for the protection of French land. But which 50 shall be rescued and which sacrificed? War is the most palpable acknowledgment of the rights of the strong and the power of money. So they let the poor and defenceless be sacrificed whilst the rich save themselves. Men who want to protect their women and children have only one thing to do: prevent war."

THE HINDU LAW OF SUCCESSION: A PRODUCT OF EVOLUTION.

"Śruti and Smṛiti are mine own commandments, whosoever transgresses them, is a law-breaker, and traitor unto Me; and though he be My devotee, he cannot be termed a Vaishnava." Such are the words recorded to have fallen from the lips of an Avatar of Vishnu. In the light of those very commandments we, the Hindus, have been regarded to have bound ourselves to act, these two or three thousands of years. And the benign British Government has not dared or chosen to thwart our personal law these one hundred years of their sovereign rule in India. Manu is at once Code and History of Hindu Law. As a Code, it contains all enactments, amendments, and repeals at once, even according to so early a sage as Brihaspati. In this very form, Manu is also a true and accurate History that speaks for itself. To one who has an eye to a historical evolution of things in general, and of law in particular, Manu covers a distinct period of at least four successive generations of men on the soil of ancient India. If Kautilya's Arthashastra should form a landmark and take us to the reign of Chandra Gupta Maurya in the last quarter of the 4th century before Christ, we can safely conclude that the age of the great Acharyas or leading Dharma Sastra writers was already long past or just over, and the present Manu was then in existence, with all its various amendments. Kane's History of the Dharma-Sastras takes a different view; that the period above-mentioned covers a full thousand years from about 600 B.C. to 400 or 600 A.D. I cannot claim his vast and varied range of study, and research-work in the field of Smṛiti literature, nor his able marshalling of facts and reasons for his conclusions. But I propose to take the reader through much easier short-cuts and bye-paths to the different conclusions of mine based on reasons to be shortly stated.

I may, before proceeding to detail, at once state and give the gist of my conclusions so far as relevant to the question of Inheritance or Succession. In Aryan patriarchal societies women had no place or rank; large estates or "gotras" descended primogenitively in the male line only; if the male line became extinct, recourse was had to the fiction of adoption or other representative sonships. The huge Dravidian population of Hindustan and South India had many things in ideals, ideas and culture to convey to their Aryan superiors, such as partition, female inheritance, slavery, (the real origin of caste and depressed classes in India), sale, including marriage by sale as distinguished from barter, including exchange of brides between different gotras, etc., notions of hell or Naraka, and of Moksha, as distinguished from the Aryan paradise or Swarga, besides the art of writing with or without its application to the preservation of sacred lore, and the cult of Bhakti as a means to attaining Godhead here or hereafter. What the Rishis from Manu to Vyasa did was to engraft upon the Aryan Vedic Common Law all the Smṛiti rules and principles of equity drawn from Dravidian sources, for very sound or palpable reasons to be found in the Aryan Law itself. For instance, Manu does not refer to a father's power to divide the property among his sons or between himself and his sons. Nay, other sages rule it atrocious for a son to drive his father to a partition. But Manu says that sons may divide it among themselves, or remain joint under the headship of the eldest brother or member, and that if they separate, there is room and reason for greater acquisition of merit on the whole, by separate performance of yajnyas or sacrifices in every home, and indirectly by the greater chances for Aryan acts of religion whose permanence and perpetuation are thereby assured. Equal division is ordained for the Sudra classes, even if the sons number a hundred, while the old partiality for the joint family system is shown by extolling it to the skies and by special favour shown to the eldest on partition, of an extra or preferential share over and above his due share in compensation for his lost right of primogeniture. Other sages say that Manu himself showed the way by partitioning his huge estate among his sons as a precedent for others to follow as a vidhi or a rule of usage or practice. Having multiplied tiny estates in the place of old impartible ones, the sages had to find a way and means to ensure the perpetual succession to the same even as the unwieldy estates of old had so long endured. They had to indent upon all the old kinds of sonship that were perhaps still lingering with them, and for the contingency of all of them failing, they had to draw upon the current Dravidian institutions of female heirs and their children succeeding to the property. Acceptable reasons therefore had to be sought for in the Vedas, Sastras or popular notions. A daughter could be, even as Daksha first set the example, appointed to rear issue for the father who had no male issue, by stipulating with her husband at the time of her marriage that her first son should be handed over to her father to supply his want of a son to redeem him from hell. If the issue of the marriage prove an only son, then he became son to both his own father and maternal grandfather. If he should die or were not born at all, then his mother (the appointed daughter) took the father's and husband's estates as well; for a daughter or wife was as good as a son, being born of or becoming by marriage union the same flesh and blood. When she died without issue, after her father Manu would allow her husband to take her father's property on his death without hesitation or discussion though in another place he would, as of old, allow the father and brothers to succeed. But later sages came to the rescue of the wife of the deceased and gave the succession to her before the father or brothers; and finally still later sages gave her the priority also over the daughter and her son. And now the order as finally settled, was the reverse of the original order of their recognition as heirs. It was now the widow, daughter and then the daughter's son. The respective reasons were easily found in the wife becoming one with the husband at the time of marriage, the daughter becoming the source of perpetuation of lineage and her son offering pinda to her ancestors as well as to his father's. And the various events that contributed to this issue lend a peculiar colour and significance to the history of the law of succession, that is, of the three new heirs above mentioned that are thrust in between the male heirs (son, grandson and great-grandson) preceding and those (father, brothers, their sons, etc.) succeeding them in the list of heirs to a deceased Hindu. And during the study of this question the chronological order of the sages that lived in the distant past becomes also evident. It would show that the 100 or 150 years preceding Kautilya was a great period of legal activity in ancient India under the rule of the Imperial (Sudra) Nanda dynasty of Mahapadma and his eight sons. The Mahabharat shows that the Kali age had already begun with the Nandas' accession, which confirms Brihaspati who says that men of his (Kali) age could not take to various kinds of adoption for reasons of fast diminishing powers etc. It appears that the institution of adoption of all sorts of sons for perpetuation of families and estates was itself the outcome of the Mahabharata War that occurred just before the advent of Kali, even as we witness similar attempts of Germany to rehabilitate her disastrously diminished population, by recourse to reduction of taxes for a married couple having more than a prescribed number of children, to additional registered wives allowed to a man (?) and to provision of hospitals to receive all orphans and abandoned infants without questioning their parentage, and to rear them as State children, and to the new law fixing women to the home and care of children. The fearsome necessity of depopulation being over, King Vena's provisions allowing Kshetraja and other sons were gradually looked upon with horror.

The original law of succession to a man leaving no son or son's son or son's son's son was as follows:—Manu says that father and brothers only take the estate of a sonless man. This was not far removed from the rule of primogeniture in such a contingency. Baudhayana, Apastamba and Gautama uniformly rule that Sapindas and Sakulyas take it; while Apastamba would include the daughter in the alternative, Gautama would add that the widow takes evidently in trust for issues (to be) begotten on her if she is willing to rear up a son by Niyoga for the benefit of her husband. Baudhayana mentions "either Putrika-putra or an ordinary daughter's son in the alternative" in his list of secondary sons; but towards the end of the list he mentions the former only as one of those who take the property, perhaps meaning that a daughter's son, though no heir, is competent to perform Sraddha. Vasishtha would give the third place in his list of heirs to the Putrika herself, that is, the appointed daughter, in anticipation or in the place of the expected son by her. Vishnu agrees with Vasishtha, with this difference that on failure of a son by the appointed daughter, she herself takes. So far it is clear that, after her son, comes the daughter. But the same sage states that the sonless man's property goes to the widow, daughter, (and a daughter's son according to another version) father, mother, brother, brother's son, Bandhu Sakulya, co-student, and lastly to the king except in the case of a Brahmin's wealth. Narada mentions the Putrika-putra in the list of secondary sons as the third, on failure of all sons, gives the unappointed daughters but not their sons the right to succeed before the Sakulyas, Bhandhus, oastemen and the king. Brihaspati gives the second rank in the list to the Putrika and her son; and allows the widow, daughter and daughter's son in this very modern and (to us) familiar order to succeed to the sonless man before his father, mother, brothers, their sons (being uterine), Sakulya, Bandhus, disciples, Brahmins in general and the king. Katyayana states that the sonless man's heirs are the widow, daughters, father, mother, brothers, their sons, step-mothers, and father's mother in this same order of succession. He would, as usual with, his predecessors, allow the king to take only after setting apart enough for the funeral expenses and for the maintenance of the deceased's women and dependants. Sankha says that the Putrika-putra is the third in the list of sons, and that the estate goes to the brothers, parents, or to the eldest widow. Devala gives the second rank to the Putrika-putra, and allows the unmarried daughter born in approved forms of marriage to succeed, failing whom comes the father, brothers of equal caste, mother and widow in order. But Harita puts the Putrika-putra as the fifth in the list but allows the widow, if young and ascetical maintenance for life. Yagnyavalkya is well-known to rule that the widow and daughters only, and then, the parents, brothers, their sons, etc., succeed to the sonless man's estate among all castes whatsoever. There is quoted a prose passage of Parasara to the effect that an unmarried daughter, failing whom a married one, succeeds. And Kautilya ranks the Putrika-putra as second only to an Aurasa, being equal to him in every way; and allows succession to the daughters born of approved marriages, then the father, brothers, their sons, and, lastly, the king, excepting as to the amount required for funeral expenses and life-long maintenance of the deceased's women.

Manu, who waxes so eloquent over the Putrika and her son as to give a right to the Putrika to go in shares with an after-born son without, of course, a claim to the preferential share always due to the eldest-born son, has clean thrown her and her son overboard in his list of sons, six of whom inherit to the father only and the other six to his collaterals also. Manu does not also refer to her own or to her son's share in competition with a Kshetrāja who is said to compete with an Aurasa for a half or fifth or sixth share, as we find in Brihaspati. This tends clearly to show that in Manu's days in Krita-yuga neither Putrika nor her son was ever an heir and that Daksha-Prajapati, son of Manu's son, Prachetas, started the precedent of adopting a Putrika for a son whom Gautama had to recognise and rank as the last but one at least in his list. Harita gives him the fifth rank while the later sages raise him to the third or even the second place. His special history clearly shows that he was originally nothing in the maternal grandfather's family, that, next, he rose rapidly in the ladder of sons, first for mere purposes of taking the maternal gotra and doing the śraddha in that family with a simple right to maintenance and with a very remote chance of getting a fourth share in the maternal grandfather's estate on failure of all other sons in the family and, lastly, that he rose to the position of an equal sharer with an Aurasa son in Brihaspati's time. Here is an instance in clear illustration of the Mitakshara principle of "First get the inheritance and then do the Śraddha next," as opposed to the Dayabhaga rule of "First do the Śraddha and then in that right or capacity take the inheritance." The Putrika and Putrika-putra, it is abundantly clear, were not incorporated into Manu until after Brihaspati who alone of all others gives them an equal place with an Aurasa son. And we have only to look at the various arthavadas used in this connection both in Manu and Brihaspati. And we are struck with the characteristically Brihaspatian spirit that is breathed into Manu; nay, some of the verses resemble each other very much. While we find Sukracharya's verses in Ausanasas Smṛiti transported verbatim and in groups into our Manu in about 75 places, we find only paraphrases of Brihaspati's verses adopted in Manu though not altogether depleted of all his (the former's) characteristic vigour and spirit. The reason is not far to seek. Sukra was in the State service of the Sudra dynasty of the Nanda, while his rival Brihaspati was only in some provincial service or under the feudal tributary of the Nanda emperors. And the way in which and the object with which this incorporation in Manu was achieved and the indifferent or promiscuous manner in which we find the words Putrika and Putrika-putra and the words Duhita, and Dauhitra wilfully or carelessly used in Manu, are just enough to show how the Mitakshara definition of Sapindaship, meaning relationship by blood, asserted its superiority over the Dayabhaga one, meaning religious competency to offer Pindas or oblations in Śraddha. This Dravidian triumph over the Vedio spirit could only be possible during the Sudra suzerainty of the Nanda Emperors and under the powerful spell of their Buddhist persuasion that laid the greatest stress on the head and heart of man than on the outward form and dry bones of stereotyped rituals and observances.

R. V. V. TATACHARIAR.

INDIANISATION AND THE BRITISH SOLDIER.

I was all by myself in a five-berth compartment at Bori Bunder. But I was none too pleased when an Anglo-Indian railway official entered at Kalyan with his little son and occupied one of the vacant berths. For the other four were all booked and, a little before the train steamed out, four British non-commissioned officers stepped in to claim their reservations. In spite of my having reserved my accommodation, I was a trifle startled at the presence of this army contingent and prepared for a determined assertion of my rights. My railway companion, I could see, was also adjusting himself to the altered situation. The soldiers were loud in their protests against intruders who had invaded 'their' compartment and angry glances were cast in our direction. The Anglo-Indian established contact with the least aggressive-looking of our new companions and explained with a degree of reasonableness that astounded me, that his son did not want a separate berth but could sleep quite comfortably on the floor of the compartment. He eventually succeeded in persuading the others that the reserved berth was his. During the long journey between Kalyan and the next halt, it was obvious that I was generally regarded as an intruder and it was not an enviable position. As I had no desire to get involved in a squabble over my berth and since I could not enter into ordinary conversation before this question of accommodation was settled, I took up a book and was very soon absorbed in it. But not to so great an extent as to be unaware of the rising indignation of my military companions who felt an additional grievance against me for being unsociable. The atmosphere of the carriage grew thick with cigarette smoke. At the next halt the soldiers enlisted the aid of the station-master who scrutinised the reservation-card on the compartment and assured them that I was all right and that they also were entitled to their berths. Strange to say, the Anglo-Indian managed to elude attention as no one thought of questioning his presence there. I felt much more interest in the possibilities of the situation now that my berth was assured to me. As sleep was out of the question—it would have been vindictive to have cleared my berth of its two other occupants—I settled down to my corner. I did not exchange a word with the others but I was somewhat annoyed when I saw, before turning in, the railway official settle down to sleep in a usurped berth. One of the soldiers in spite of a last friendly hint from the railwayman that he could without danger slip into the neighbouring first class and travel in comfort, as no 'ticket-inspection takes place at night,' decided to stay up the night reading. The display of so much consideration by one whom I had expected to be most undisciplined and disorderly in civil life so surprised me that I was several times on the point of allowing the soldier to relax his vigil and use my berth for part of the journey while I sat up reading. But prudence overcame my good impulse and the fear that I might not find it easy to get back my berth once I gave the use of it to my companion held me back.

In the morning we were all feeling more friendly towards each other. A good beginning was made by the most ferocious of the military batch who stuck his head out of his berth and greeted me across the compartment with a cheery 'Good morning.' In half-an-hour I was listening to a discourse on the problems of the modern army. The men were returning from the training-school at Belgaum and were full of their subject—poison-gas and remedial measures. One of the four was really anxious for a war which, he urged, would be more humane than the last one as the gases used would be for the purpose of disabling temporarily and not killing the opponent, and would be of shorter duration as the objective will be attained by attacking the civilians by air raids. The others were against war but deplored the monotony of military life in India, relieved only by occasional riotings. The war-enthusiast, however, regretted that the only contact between the British soldier and the civilians among whom he has to stay, was in these riots which he thought could very well be allowed to blow over without intervention. He turned to me and said that the country was a wonderful one and the people most law-abiding but there was not enough education and too much over-education for a few. He expressed a desire for greater meeting occasions between army men and civilians and added that, because there were a few bad men in the army, all were tarred with the same brush. I was not much interested in the trend the conversation was taking but I felt that any attempt to turn it to a particular point would rouse suspicion. All four men had been seven years in India and were near the conclusion of their first term of enlistment. They were trying to get into civilian life and told me they would only enter on a fresh term if they failed to do so. The war-enthusiast suddenly turned to me and remarked that in another ten years Indians would be governing themselves—"except," he added, "of course, the army." I had been waiting for this and I asked him what he thought of the Indianisation scheme. He knew nothing of it in the abstract but he said he had met some of the new officers from Dehra Dun and they were very good. He expressed the readiness of the British soldier to take orders from Indian officers and added, "You may believe it or not. But the British soldier will do things for an Indian officer which he will not for a British officer." I was not prepared for this and I remarked that we were told just the reverse. He laughed as he assured me I could take his word for it. He said that the army was free from race prejudice and although a few of the older men were anxious for prestige the younger ones were eager to be friendly with the people. As they got off at their destination shouldering their luggage he made his contribution to current politics with the comment that there were no chances of a war at present although there were skirmishes in Africa. On Indian affairs he felt that the civilian had more to fear from the police than from the military. As if to demonstrate this, his vacant seat next to me was immediately occupied by an inspector of police who carried himself in a stiff starched manner. His luggage was carried by policemen who stood solemnly around the door to bid him good-bye. With an effort he turned round and looked at me. A brief inquiring glance and we both knew we would not hit it off. Once more I sought refuge in my book. As the policeman got down for a studied stroll on the platform of a wayside station, the little Anglo-Indian boy asked his father, "Daddy, why is he so unsociable?" When I looked up, the gentleman remarked to me, "The tommies were fine fellows. One of them spoke even to you for two hours but this man is stuck-up." The return of the inspector restored quiet to the carriage.

There were more soldiers on the way back. With the first of these I travelled a good distance alone. He was younger and even more radical in his views.

He had been up on the Frontier and he said, "Frankly, I don't know why we are defending this dusty track. It would be sensible to retire behind the Indus and use it as a natural boundary. The trouble is," he went on, "the hostile tribes are jealous of the assistance we render the friendly tribes and seek to harass them in order to obtain certain benefits. We, having established friendly relations with the lower tribes, have to support them against these attacks. Any way," he concluded, "you fellows will have to grapple with these problems very soon." I asked him what he meant. "Why not?" he said, "Why should you not guard your own frontiers?" I informed him that much of the political agitation was summed up in his sentence; and I asked if his views were generally held in the army. "Of course not," he flashed out. "No one will quarrel with his bread and butter. You mean to say, if I could have got a billet in Britain I would have come out here?" He too wanted to see more of Indian life. He told me there was one good change now brought about in the Indian army. English had been made the medium instead of Urdu. I asked him when this had taken place and he told me it was six months back. Then I asked why it was done but he could not enlighten me beyond saying that this would increase possibilities of contact between Indian soldiers and British. The next halt saw more soldiers and one of them, rather old, got into our carriage. I looked at my companion. Not a flicker of recognition crossed his face as our eyes met. But he commended me to the new arrival as he left us two stations later. This gentleman had been thirteen years in the army and was a much domesticated self-centred man. An intimate discussion on the treatment of sties drew us together. Before half-an-hour was out, I knew all about his "mehsaheb" and his three-year old son. He complained bitterly that a military man was treated worse than a "mehhtar" in Bombay, presumably by civilian Europeans because he did not strike me as likely to associate with Indians very much. He explained that the British soldier's knowledge of Indians was confined to the army contractor who made money out of him and so there was much prejudice against the people of this country. He put down all the political unrest to unemployment but apparently regarded his position as secure as long as he wanted to remain. But, he concluded, the treatment given to a soldier out here was not what it used to be and therefore there was a likelihood of the career failing to appeal to young Englishmen. But he was really more concerned about an increase he was expecting early next year. He had spoken to me not out of friendliness but because keeping silent would have killed him. As I left him at Bombay, I thought more kindly of his young colleague who had felt impelled to disguise his acquaintanceship with me.

CONSOLIDATION IN RURAL INDIA.

At a time when the uplift of villages is occupying every active mind, it is not improper to consider a problem closely connected with it. The lifeblood of India, the seven lakhs of villages, is at present in a stage of transition following the decay of a time-worn system of land tenure and due to the encroachment of new ideas. Both the Zamindari and the rayatwari systems which now obtain currency in India are full of defects which more elastic systems could easily have removed. The village is chained to the fields that surround it both for its economic, as well as social, prosperity. Whereas formerly it was self-sufficient, today it is on the high road to internationalization, losing its self-sufficiency of the past and becoming linked closer with the outside world.

India is still a country so ultra rural that her problem is largely a rural problem. The villages, as they are at present, must necessarily enter into a programme of useful changes to recuperate their lost vitality, and to retain their individuality as units of administration in British India. One of the defects from which it has long been suffering and which demands immediate remedy, is the minute sub-division and fragmentation of holdings which has been going on for centuries together. This has brought in its train some lamentable consequences. The growth of individualism aided by the impact of Western civilization and the great idea of private property which was greatly influenced by the judgment of English judges and jurists has produced convulsions in the joint family system. The latter has been compelled to divide its holdings of cultivable and waste land among its members, and this division has continued from generation to generation. Where the Zamindari system obtains vogue, the land has been somewhat spared of this cruel mutilation; but where the system is rayatwari, the body has been cruelly mangled and the bits scattered. The peculiarities of the Hindu and Mohammadan laws of inheritance also have been a potent factor in furthering this sub-division. The unstable and rather dangerous position of landowners who held their property during the pleasure of the reigning princes in the earlier centuries, made them eager to bestow upon their relatives as much land as possible so that if a calamity should fall on the head of the chief member, the others at least might have a means of subsistence.

A visit to villages, for example, in the Tanjore or Tinnevely District in South India, or in U. P. or in Bengal must convince anybody how widespread the evil is. Speaking of South India, the fields are owned by a huge number of tenants and their possessions range from less than half an acre to ten or twelve. Holdings of more than twenty acres are very few, and in a whole village one or two may own more than fifty acres. Dr. Horace H. Mann of Deccan fame says, "that in the last sixty or seventy years the character of land holdings has altogether changed. Now the number of holdings is more than doubled and 81 per cent of these holdings are under ten acres while no less than 60 per cent are less than five acres." If a man is able to scrape together a few hundred rupees, he secures for himself a fraction of an acre from some less fortunate individual and has not the wherewithal to buy more. The holdings of a single person are often separated from one another sometimes even by miles. Such distribution, in fact, is only too common.

The tillers of the soil, who have adhered to old ways of cultivation, have suffered hardships of incalculable magnitude due to this process. Their cost of ploughing, fencing, watering, sowing and reaping have remained uniformly high, owing to intermittent work and conveying of the agricultural implements from place to place. This has been responsible for the backwardness of agriculture in India. Dr. Mann, who has been in South India for a considerable period, observes that "it prevents the use of machinery and labour-saving methods," and "on the other hand, it hinders the adoption of really intensive methods of cultivation" which India wants badly at present. There are many other difficulties which the small cultivator has to overcome, as the digging of separate wells, investing more capital but receiving only lesser returns etc. Valuable ground is lost in laying boundaries. "This destroys enterprise, results in enormous wastage of labour, leads to a very large loss of land owing to boundaries;... and presents the possibility of introducing outsiders, with more money, as tenant farmers or purchasers of good agricultural property."

A prima facie case has been established for consolidating together such fragmented pieces of land by most writers on Economics and on the subject of Rural Reconstruction in India. Consolidation aims at improving the lot of the overstricken peasant and at extricating him from his present difficulties. Like co-operative and agricultural credit, it is advocated for the redemption of the small cultivator. It has its effects on agricultural credit also. With a single plot of large land in one place instead of little bits lying isolated here and there, the chances of better utility of the same amount of money are more and the cultivator will surely exercise judgment in this case. He is benefitted in every way for he can adopt improved methods of agriculture, rotation of crops and can concentrate his attention on one spot.

Consolidation is sought to be effected by amalgamating all the various pieces a person may hold together into one whole. It is impossible to act alone and a whole village must be taken up at each step and the holdings reconstituted by an authorised officer with the concurrence of the local government. The village Panchayats can do good work in this direction. Legislation must sanction compulsory expropriation of existing holders and compulsory reconstitution of these on sound lines with due regard to the losses which may accrue to individuals out of natural advantages. Of course, the good will of the people will move a lot. Such a procedure would certainly further the interests of the agricultural community and though some initial opposition may be expected, the people are bound to appreciate the wisdom of such a step.

Many may doubt the possibility of practical success to this plan but even if only partially successful the step is well worth trying. But I may point out here that definite success has been achieved in those few places where this had been carried out. In Punjab, due to the energetic efforts of Mr. F. L. Brayne, C. I. E., I. C. S., Commissioner for Rural Reconstruction, consolidation has been made a success in many villages. Such rural reconstruction centres must be started wherever possible and definite steps taken.

Consolidation has been recognised to be the backbone of rural reconstruction. Without it attempts at increasing the prosperity of the villager are bound to be futile. There is a danger to consolidation, which must be prevented early enough. The reconstituted holdings must be made indivisible and also immune from seizure for debts. There is also the danger on the other side—combination. Such reconstituted holdings must remain single in all cases, allowing for a maximum and a minimum limit. When these preventive measures are taken, consolidation is really desirable and the landlords should make a move of their own accord. When the initiative comes from them matters will be much simplified.

HINDU MAHASABHA'S OPPORTUNITY.

The Editor

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

When oppression becomes unbearable in any sphere of life high-souled and intelligent men in their respective spheres vehemently protest and threaten action and thus open the eyes of the lay public. At all times regeneration, re-orientation, and reformation have come like this only.

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Dec. 28]

Dr. Ambedkar's threatening and warning is one such. The Hindu Mahasabha is meeting shortly under the undisputed high-souled leader Panditji. Will it seriously consider the doctor's protest and warning by taking practical and sure steps or will it simply pass some resolutions and forget them till it meets again?

Of all communities and groups in India it is the Hindu community only which is not organised well on the religious and social side. An average intelligent young Hindu almost ignores or allows to pass without a protest any foolish belief and custom of his. It is this that has brought the degeneration of Hindu society. If he is English educated he rarely gives a thought for his religion and for the several injustices prevailing in his community. Leaders of the Hindu society who preach extreme measures in politics are abnormally conservative in religious and social matters. If they only care they can, in spite of the vast orthodoxy that will face them, they can and could have brought radical reform long ago. The truth is except a few isolated souls like Gandhiji, and others like him, none else care and think of the religious and social ills of the Hindus and try to remove them by precept and practice.

I would certainly as a Congressman wish that politics is eschewed from all sectarian organisations and Congress and Congress alone should speak in one voice for political India. Political fights will change according to times and circumstances but social and religious work has to be done with great faith and patience. The Hindu Mahasabha can and should grapple with the problems of the Hindus in social and religious spheres. Other communities should not interfere since Hindus alone know their difficulties and the remedies for it.

Let the Mahasabha, therefore, invite to a big conference all the important Hindu religious heads and other accredited leaders in a central place, since in spite of all that is said and done these religious heads still hold a strong sway over the Hindus. In fact many of them are for radical reforms if properly approached and their grievances are that they are not at all cared for. Let the Mahasabha, therefore, invite them and then thresh out the different problems of different provinces and come to some workable understanding. An organisation like the Servants of India Society or Servants of the People Society founded by the revered Lalaji in the Punjab should be started. It may be named "Servants of Hindu Society." Young Hindus, intelligent strong-willed and pure in character, should be taken in it and given a training for three to five years in Hindu religion, comparative study of other religions besides history, geography, elements of law, sanitation, first aid, etc. and after that let them be sent to different taluks and villages to work among Hindus; to look after and to redress many meaningless soraples and determine at the same time not to interfere or take sides in political factions and fights. If such a thing is done, within ten years the Hindu religion and its society will become the pride of Hindustan and will be a shining light for the whole world. If not, in the course of a few years Hinduism will decay. It has enemies on all sides. Will the Mahasabha take this work at least now or will it be only fighting for seats in the unwanted councils, assemblies and chambers?

Yours etc.,

(FROM A NEW YORK CORRESPONDENT.)

His Exalted Highness the Nizam of Hyderabad has deputed Syed Mahboob Ali, Director of the Wireless Department of the Hyderabad Government, to study in Europe and America the broadcasting systems in those countries with a view to improve the present broadcasting station of Hyderabad. Mr. Mahboob Ali has already visited the principal broadcasting stations in Great Britain, France, Germany, Italy and other European countries and has placed an order with the Marconi Company for the supply of two broadcasting stations for the State of Hyderabad. Further orders are expected to be placed with other companies later on, altogether amounting to 12 to 15 lacs of rupees. He is now visiting the United States and inspecting the workings of broadcasting of the National Broadcasting Company and their two principal stations WEAf and WJZ.

At the time of the celebration of the Silver Jubilee of the Nizam, it is planned to give to his 20,000 villages radio sets as a sort of Jubilee gift. When the arrangements are completed messages will be broadcast to nearly 15,000,000 people in four different languages.

About two years ago Sir Akbar Hydari, the Finance Minister of the State of Hyderabad, said at a meeting of the East India Association in London that, on his return from the delegation to the Round Table Conference, he would take active steps to promote a general broadcasting system in Hyderabad, and establish a Broadcasting Board.

Syed Mahboob Ali was originally an official in the State Post Office, and began to interest himself in wireless some twelve years ago. He made his own receiving set and some six years later made himself a transmitting apparatus with which he gave programmes to his friends. When King George broadcast a speech to India before the preliminary session of the Round Table Conference in 1931 the official report from India was that it was inaudible. Mr. Mahboob Ali, however, received it on his own set so clearly that he was able to make a record of the speech to reproduce it on King George's birthday in 1934.

His experiments began to interest many people among them Sir Akbar Hydari, the Finance Minister whose enthusiasm was further stimulated when he attended a conference of the Indian Village Welfare Association in London in 1933, at which wireless was discussed. In 1934 the Nizam of Hyderabad heard a broadcast of Mr. Mahboob Ali's, and was so much impressed with it that he allowed a speech of his own to be broadcast some time later. Finally, at the beginning of this year Mr. Mahboob Ali's experimental station was taken over by the State, he himself acting as Director responsible to a board of three Ministers, of whom Sir Akbar Hydari is the chairman. The board in its turn is responsible only to the Nizam.

It is hoped that the improvement in broadcasting service will widen the outlook and educate the people of the dominions of H. E. H. the Nizam. Mr. Mahboob Ali is now staying with his friend and countryman, Mr. Kedarnath Das Gupta, General Executive of the World Fellowship of Faiths, at its head-quarters at Hotel New Yorker, New York City.

*This letter has been held over for want of space for three weeks. Syed Mahboob Ali returned to India last week.

CENTRAL ADVISORY BOARD OF EDUCATION.

A Press 'communique' issued in connection with the meeting of the Central Advisory Board of Education, says :—

The Central Advisory Board of Education held its first meeting on Thursday and Friday, December 19 and 20, 1933.

It was felt on all sides that large numbers of pupils are tempted to prolong unduly their purely literary studies and that, as a result, they become averse from practical pursuits and occupations; and that, therefore, the most effective means of improving the situation lies in a radical reconstruction of school education in such a manner that the scheme of school education shall consist of definite stages, each with a clearly defined objective, as a result of which pupils would be diverted, on the completion of each stage, to practical occupations and to vocational institutions. This policy of reconstruction should therefore be one, not of restricting educational facilities, in any way but rather of diverting at a comparatively early age a number of pupils, who, after having acquired a suitable measure of general education would be capable of receiving training of a practical and vocational type, for which ample facilities should be provided.

General unanimity having been achieved on the main principles of advance, it was decided that a Committee consisting of the Educational Commissioner (Chairman), Khan Bahadur Mr. Aziz-ul-Haque, Mr. B. G. Khaparde, Mr. Syamaprasad Mookerjee, Dr. A. H. MacKenzie and Mr. W. Grieve, should draft a resolution in further detail, which would be discussed by the Board on the next day.

A large portion of the second day was therefore spent in modifying and in amplifying the draft Resolution, which after much discussion, was ultimately passed in the following terms :—

THE RESOLUTION.

1. While conscious of the great debt which is due to the education hitherto provided in India and of the part played by universities in promoting higher study and research and in training men and women for the service of India, the Board is of opinion that the following considerations among others, necessitate a new attitude towards educational problems :—

(a) The increasing desire among educationists and others to bring about changes in the educational system in view of the altered conditions of life.

(b) The growing volume of unemployment among the educated classes.

(c) The emphasis laid on a purely literary form of instruction in schools.

(d) The inadvisability of too frequent examinations.

(e) The large number of 'over-age' pupils in the senior classes of high schools.

(f) The increasing number of students in universities, who are unable to benefit by university instruction and, in consequence, the difficulty in making satisfactory provision for the better qualified students and for research.

(g) The need of developing training of a more practical type than at present and of making provision for such training, especially for those with little or no literary bent, and of adjusting it to the scheme of general education.

(h) The advisability of developing a suitable scheme of rural education, by which boys and girls in rural areas shall be given such training as would develop in them a capacity and desire for the work of rural reconstruction.

2. The Board is of opinion that a radical readjustment of the present system of education in schools should be made in such a way as not only to prepare pupils for professional and university courses, but also to enable them, at the completion of appropriate stages, to be diverted to occupations or to separate vocational institutions.

3. These stages should be :—

(a) "The primary stage," which should aim at providing at least a minimum of general education and training and which will ensure permanent literacy.

(b) "The lower secondary stage," which will provide a self-contained course of general education and will constitute a suitable foundation either for higher education or for specialized practical courses.

In rural areas the courses at this stage should be attuned to rural requirements?

Some form of manual training at this stage should be provided, which would aim at the development of practical aptitudes and be made compulsory.

(c) "The higher secondary stage," in which would be included institutions with varying length of courses :—

(i) Preparing students for admission to universities in arts and science ;

(ii) For the training of teachers in rural areas ;

(iii) For agricultural training ;

(iv) For clerical training ; and,

(v) For training in selected technical subjects which should be chosen in consultation with employers.

Where separate institutions are not possible for the diversified courses, some of them might be incorporated in a higher secondary course of enlarged scope which would permit a choice of alternative groups of subjects and would end in a leaving certificate.

The certificates granted to pupils completing other specialized courses should receive Government recognition.

4. At the end of the lower secondary school course there should be the first public examination.

5. Candidates desirous of joining the subordinate clerical services of Government and of local bodies should pass such qualifying examinations as might be prescribed by proper authority and should not be more than 19 years of age at the date of their examination.

6. The Board is of opinion that expert advice would be of value in organizing the scheme of reconstruction as outlined above.

7. Each province should organize Employment Bureaux for the purpose of advising students and of eliciting support and guidance of employers interested in the problem.

The Board were not content, however, with their proposals for school reconstruction ; they went further and passed their final recommendation in the following terms :

The Board is of the opinion that every Local Government should actively explore the possibility of finding new avenues of employment and occupation and also to provide for the training of suitable experts who would advise young men and women in regard to their aptitudes and fitness for particular careers suited to different regions.

The following Committees were appointed with the authority to co-opt members who would be likely to provide local experience and guidance.

Women's Education:

1. Lady Grigg.

2. Rajkumari Amrit Kaur.

3. Dr. Mackenzie.

4. Dr. Bhagvan Das.

CAN HINDUS BELIEVE IN JESUS?

The following letter written by Mr. O. Kandaswami Chettiar, Convener of the Fellowship of the Followers of Jesus, to Mr. G. Solomon of the Young Men's Christian Association, Madras, has been sent to us. It refers to a resolution passed at a gathering of Christians on the subject of Conversions:

Dear Mr. Solomon,

I have received the summary of notes taken down of the views expressed at the Red Hills, on various questions bearing on "Conversion."

Will you allow me to state that these notes can hardly be called 'findings'? Findings mean conclusions arrived at after a full discussion of a subject in which various points of view are expressed, and the various points urged are considered and met and agreement arrived at, to which most if not all present consent.

You remember that no discussion of this kind took place at the gathering of friends at the Red Hills on Sunday, the 3rd November. The method adopted then was the Round Table Method such as Stanley Jones uses in order to find out the views of people without any idea of arriving at conclusions. This method is intended to enable a study of the viewpoints of different people, so that a comprehensive view may be taken of the situation in the country. Nobody dreams that this method would yield 'findings' of any value, for in that case the claims of Jesus Christ on human belief, for instance, would be settled once for all by an aecumenical council, consisting of the young men and older men, Hindus, Mohamadens, Christians, Sikhs, Parsees—students, merchants, office-clerks, etc.—who assemble at these groups.

One of the so-called 'findings' of the group at Red Hills was an emphatic statement that none could be a Christian without baptism. I am inclined to agree with this statement that none could be a Christian (the noun, meaning a communal Christian) a member of the Indian Christian community in India, an Indian Christian without baptism. But I hesitate when I remember that Quakers have no baptism, that the Salvation Army has no baptismal rite. If this dictum is correct the poor Quakers and the poor Salvationists would be left out of the Church, in the cold, weeping and gnashing their teeth. But I am glad the statement does not say that no one could be a Christian man or woman (Christian being used as an adjective signifying the moral and spiritual qualities associated with Christ) i. e. a disciple of Christ, without baptism. There is hope then for the Quakers, Salvationists, and the poor Hindus who believe in Jesus and endeavour to follow Him in their lives.

Speaking of Hindus, with whom we in India are chiefly concerned,—this dictum means; that no

Hindu has a right to believe in Christ, and endeavour to live up to His principles and enter into His purposes, and co-operate with fellow believers in working out His purposes, in trying to bring in His Kingdom among men,—without being baptised and getting the sanction and approval of Christians like the friends with whom I enjoyed one fine week-end on the banks of the Red Hills Tank.

Your note says that the group was emphatic on this point. The emphasis, if I remember aright, was carried so far as to say, and not merely to suggest, that no Hindu could honestly believe in Christ and be unbaptised: and that a Hindu who believes in Christ and remains unbaptised is either a hypocrite or a coward. Viewing the question without any personal reference or application, it is very important that such a statement should be frankly examined and either confirmed and affirmed or repudiated and condemned. Apart from the apostolic and papal authority implied in the statement—either to bind or unloose—it is not calculated to advance the cause of Christ in India. We of the Fellowship of the Followers of Jesus, standing as we do between Hindus and Christians, have a stiff fight to maintain against the Hindus who honestly believe and more or less openly say that every Hindu who joins the Christian Church does so from selfish and sordid motives, and no Hindu does so from honest conviction. I do not care to paraphrase in detail all that is sought to be conveyed by such a statement.

Between these two positions, in point of fairness and charity, there is very little to choose. But as members of the Fellowship of the Followers of Jesus whose aim is to get persons in India to endeavour, whatever their communal affiliations may be, to live up to the standards, principles, and ideals of Jesus, and seek to understand His personality, we find that the respective positions of the Christians and the Hindus form a great stumbling block in persuading earnest men to be followers of Christ even as His own disciples were. I submit that in these circumstances it requires no little courage, not to speak of earnestness and sincerity, for believers in Jesus to steer their way in obedience to their conscience and the leadings of the spirit.

I remain,
Yours sincerely,
O. KANDASWAMI CHETTY

INDIANS OVERSEAS.

To safeguard and promote the interests, rights and privileges of Indians in colonies, to obtain decent conditions of living especially for labourers and to strengthen the organisations already existing for this purpose, an Association styled the Overseas Indians' Association was formed at a meeting held on 20th Dec, at the Servants of India Society, Royapettah. Sir P. S. Sivaswami Aiyar presided.

Mr. R. Suryanarayan Rao, one of the convenors, explained the circumstances under which they proposed to form an Association. He said that correspondence was entered into with the Imperial Indian Citizenship Association, Bombay, with a view to ascertaining if that Association would allow the Madras Association to be its branch. For some reason the Bombay Association desired that its name should not be used. A telegram had, however, been received by them from the Bombay Association that morning to say that it would be in a position to consider the affiliation to it of the Madras Association under certain conditions. That, however, need not stand in the way of their starting an Association for Madras.

The Chairman said that the Imperial Indian Citizenship Association in Bombay had been in existence for a number of years and was doing good work. In a matter of this kind, he added, there could be no clash of interests. In Madras they could form an Association to be affiliated to the Bombay Association. There was no need to form an entirely separate Association. What was needed was that they should have a number of active workers interested in the cause of Indians overseas, with resources to carry on the work.

Mr. C. R. Srinivasan said that most of the Indians emigrating to Burma, the Straits Settlements and other parts were from the South. While they might look to the co-operation of the Imperial Indian Citizenship Association in Bombay, it was the duty of South Indians to see that their fellow-men were provided with decent conditions of labour and living and proper citizenship rights. The organisation they now proposed to form in Madras, he said, need not be a rival organisation to that in Bombay, but only for the purpose of creating public opinion in this Presidency.

Mr. C. Jinarajadasa (on behalf of Dr. G. S. Arundale, one of the signatories to the holding of the meeting) said that there were many Theosophists and others in foreign countries interested in the problem of Indians overseas who would be willing to co-operate with the Association if invited to join it.

Mr. V. S. Sarma, a former resident of Malaya, expressed the need for the starting of an Association in Madras as had been contemplated and narrated the difficulties under which Indians laboured in the colonies.

Mr. C. R. Srinivasan next proposed that the Association be formed and read out the draft constitution.

The constitution was seconded by Mr. S. S. Sankara Mudaliar and carried.

Office-bearers were then elected. Sir P. S. Sivaswami Aiyar was unanimously elected President of the Association: Messrs. P. T. Rajan, Jamal Mahomed, C. Jinarajadasa, S. Satyamurti, V. Bhashyam Iyengar, Yakub Hasan and Dr. P. Subbarayan were elected Vice-Presidents. Messrs. C. R. Srinivasan and R. Suryanarayana Rao were elected Joint Secretaries. Mr. S. M. Chaudhry was elected Treasurer.

An Executive Committee of twelve members was formed. The office of the Association will be located at the Servants of India Society. The subscription for membership was fixed at three rupees per annum.

The Hon. Mr. P. T. Rajan suggested that the formal inauguration of the Association might be made by Mr. Peri Sundaram, Minister of Labour in Ceylon, who was expected to visit Madras shortly.

The suggestion was accepted.

Mr. C. R. Srinivasan proposed a vote of thanks to the Chairman and the meeting then terminated.

JUDO.

There is a woman in London who can claim to be the only woman in the world holding the honour of the "black belt" in Judo, a Japanese system of self-defence and exercise. She is Mrs. Sarah Mayer, and so dainty and so very feminine is she, that she does not look at all like a woman who could throw strong men about like feathers in a breeze. But she can.

Progression in Judo goes by belts. First the white of the tyro, then orange, green, blue and brown, until is met the stiffest hurdle of all, the black belt.

In an interview with the London press this week, Mrs. Mayer said that it all began when she was a very small girl.

"As long as I can remember," she said, "I have been interested in Japan."

UNPRECEDENTED! PERMANENT! INSPIRING!
WORLD FELLOWSHIP.

For the first time in history representatives of all Creeds, Climes and Cultures met in Chicago in 1933 to seek for spiritual solutions for the problems of the modern world. The World Fellowship of Faiths has published the proceedings of the conferences in a unique volume of 1004 pages. Among the contributors to this volume are distinguished men of all countries—the late Jane Addams, Mrs. Margaret Sanger, John Haynes Holmes, Dr. J. T. Sunderland and John Dewey from the United States; the late Sylvain Levi and Romain Rolland from France; the late Arthur Henderson, Muriel Lester and Sir Francis Young-husband from Britain; H. H. the Gaekwar of Baroda, Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi and K. Natarajan from India; Professor Hu Shih from China; and messages from world figures like Mahatma Gandhi and Sir Oliver Lodge.

A limited number of copies of this valuable work of reference have been sent to us for circulation in India and can be had for Rs. 10/- (Rupees ten only) postage 12 as. extra from—

NOTES

W. C. Bonnerjee :—The Dnyanodaya writing of the Jubilee of the Indian National Congress has posthumously converted one of its founders to Christianity. Mr. Sachchidananda Sinha, who knew the late Mr. W. C. Bonnerjee intimately, in the course of an interesting sketch of his life in the special Jubilee number of the Bombay Chronicle observes: "He never renounced Hinduism—as was wrongly stated by Mahatma Gandhi at the Second Round Table Conference—and was proud of his being a Brahmin, and the monument (over his ashes in his Croydon home) described him, as he had himself desired, as a 'Hindu Brahmin'." Professor K. Sundararaman of Madras in his reminiscences of the first session of the Congress, contributed to the Jubilee number of the Hindu, says that, happening to sit next to Bonnerjee at a social gathering, he asked him what he thought of the future of the Hindus. Bonnerjee replied: "You will be simply astonished to hear that I am altogether in favour of a strict adherence to our orthodox views and customs. Do not judge of me by what I am." Mr. Sinha gives some other interesting details of the early life of W. C. Bonnerjee. He was born in a poor Brahmin family of Calcutta and was an indifferent student at school. He was in consequence withdrawn by his father from school and apprenticed to a solicitor while he was yet in the Matriculation class. He remained two years here when, by great good luck, he secured one of six scholarships for the study of law in England offered by Mr. Rustomji Jeejeebhoy of Bombay. Among his friends and contemporaries in England were Dadabhai Naoroji, Pherozeshah Mehta, and Buddraddin Tyebji, all future Presidents of the National Congress. Bonnerjee's first brief was as defence counsel in a case in which Mr. (afterwards Lord) Macdonnell, then a sub-divisional officer, charged a fisherwoman with having brought a false charge against him. The woman was acquitted by the British magistrate who tried the case.

This Democracy :—Whenever Fascist critics attack Democracy as 'a Westernising, formal, corrupt system, run by an immense minority, of the rich which with entire lack of scruple, has hitherto understood only too well how the immense majority can be controlled,' complacent Britons reassure themselves with the thought that the criticism refers not so much to their parliamentary system as to the representative institutions of the United States. The recent elections, however, have given rise to many qualms in British hearts. Mr. H. N. Brailsford contributes a striking article to the current New Republic on the downfall of the British Liberal Party in which he discusses the development of party politics after the War. "The owning class," he writes, "was ready to forget its historic divisions. Capital, with all its satellite groups, was now solidly ranged against the wage-earners." The post-war unity of the British governing class which Mr. Brailsford analyses so well, has a practical side which Mr. G. T. Garratt exposes in an article in The New Statesman. "The candidate need do little himself," he writes, "except sign cheques, roll up to a few smoking concerts and do the 'popular popular' business. The real work is done by the agent and his paid organisers. It is their job to see that no slate club meets without 'ten shillings to drink the Member's health' or 'the captain's health,' for rather spurious military titles are part of the game. No branch of the British Legion must lack the subscription which brings a vice-presidentship, no group of old people must play draughts without a cup being provided, or young people dance without a subsidy towards the expenses. Gradually the agent establishes harmonious contacts with those active and often venal people who organise the amusements of innumerable non-political voters. Labour does not enter into this game and the Conservatives gain all those people who, despising politics, believe in getting what they can from the politician."

The Alternative :—Mr. Garratt refers to the two modern methods of preventing opponents from holding election meetings by hiring halls for the entire election period or submitting to heavy overcharges to keep out the poorer party. The worst form of coercion is the pressure put by employers on their men in times of unemployment. After a mention of the motor car problem which has been a feature of recent elections—Mr. Garratt writes that several Labour votes were not polled for lack of conveyance—he asks whether democracy can survive the contest between the 'haves' and the 'have nots' fought under rules made by the former. But Mr. Garratt suggests no way out. If the change is to come through the parliamentary machinery, Mr. Garratt and his friends will have a difficult task in persuading the 'haves' to move from their point of vantage. The National Government Party will naturally not introduce any electoral reform that may cost them seats. If the change is to be brought about by direct action outside Parliament then the British constitution will doubtless go overboard. It is not unlikely that the British National Party will develop rapidly into a full-fledged Fascist one if Mr. Garratt's fears are widely shared in the country. But in any case the Labour Party, as it is today, has small chance of survival. The number of letters in the New Statesman urging the adoption of a downright Socialist programme and a departure from the present imitations of conservatives in office is significant of the growing discontent with the existing British Socialist party.

Mr. Elwin's Christmas Message :—If the Indian public was surprised to read Verrier Elwin's name among the broadcasters in the B. B. C. series for Christmas Day, the contents of that message must have been startling to those who were following the recent discussion in these columns on the Gonds and their relation to Hinduism. Mr. Elwin had maintained that he never interfered with their religion and that it would be better for "all of us" to adopt a similar attitude of detachment and leave their ancestral faith alone. We do not know how Mr. Elwin squares the tiny mud chapel of St. Francis in Karanjia and even more the children's Christmas, with tree and fire complete, to which he treated the Gond children, with his declared attitude. It cannot be that Mr. Elwin turns missionary on Christmas Day alone. Nor would one be justified in seeing in this conformity with conventional Christian celebration a sop to the thoughtless critics who had read in Mr. Elwin's break with the Anglican Church a denial of Christianity. We think that Mr. Verrier Elwin just felt the desire for festivity and happened to select Christmas because it was full of meaning for him. He ought to have remembered that if Hindu festivals had no meaning to the Gond, Christmas must have meant still less. A selection of some Gond feast for celebration would have been more appropriate. It would not have been meaningless even to Mr. Elwin who has in other matters so thoroughly identified himself with the people among whom he lives. The concluding reference to 'lonely places in the Empire' in Mr. Elwin's message, which we print this week, is likely to give readers a misleading impression that the speaker has given up the missionary life for that of Empire-builder. Mr. Elwin was careful to avoid any suggestion that his was a typical Indian Christmas. We regret to note that the press has not shown a similar caution.

Lucknow University Parliament :—We cannot congratulate Dr. R. P. Paranjpye on his handling of the recent controversy in Lucknow University Students' Parliament. In a statement explaining his action Dr. Paranjpye as Vice-Chancellor gives the facts. Mr. Anwar Jamal Kidwai, a scholarship-holder of the University, was asked to form a Socialist Government in the Parliament. He apparently acted the part so effectively that the President requested him to modify the language of a presidential message which Mr. Kidwai had submitted and on which he was uncompromising. Rather than tone down his 'message', Mr. Kidwai resigned his leadership and promptly issued a "most scurrilous" pamphlet abusing all capitalists, imperialists and their supporters in general and the local talukdars in particular. He even attacked his professors in language subversive of 'all proper discipline in the University.' Dr. Paranjpye who has usually a keen sense of humour, has evidently taken this young Socialist as seriously as Mr. Kidwai takes himself, and, on the ground that Lucknow University cannot tolerate an attack on talukdars who have contributed most generously to its funds, he has threatened disciplinary action against Mr. Kidwai even if he apologises. He concludes that he will, in the event of an apology, merely discontinue a Canning College scholarship bestowed on Mr. Kidwai as it is endowed by talukdars. We presume Mr. Kidwai has won his scholarship on merit and that there is no clause restricting it to admirers of the Oudh talukdars. It would be a gross injustice if Mr. Kidwai is coerced by the University to change his opinion, however immature it may seem to the veteran politician who is Lucknow's Vice-Chancellor. Mr. Kidwai, realising that he could not compel the President to read a message of which he disapproved to the Parliament, resigned his leadership. If the President was not prepared to enter into the spirit of the students' mock parliament, it was rash of him to have asked anyone to form a Socialist Government. Having done it, Dr. Paranjpye should have explained to the talukdars or their representatives, that the heavens would not have fallen if Mr. Kidwai had made his speech. Unlike Bottom Mr. Kidwai obviously is unable to "roar you as gently as any sucking dove" but the talukdars should be more tolerant and not penalise him for a not uncommon failing.

Women's Role in National Life :—Another bone of contention seems to have been thrown among Congress leaders—the place of women in national life. Mrs. Sarojini Naidu presiding over a women's meeting in Bombay during Jubilee celebrations, expressed the Women's Conference ideal when she appealed to them to 'stand on their own legs and eke out their own livelihood.' But Babu Rajendra Prasad displayed considerable sympathy for the Nazi ideal of sending women back to the home when he appealed to women to restore prosperity to this country by reverting to the ancient domestic occupations of plying the charka, cooking food, stitching clothes and nursing children. Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel who knows his Bombay public thoroughly, felt it was too much to ask them to ply the charka but that it would be more than enough if Bombay women supported home industries and set the villagers an example of simple living. Forgetting the jubilee need for smoothing out differences and overlooking one another's defects, the intrepid Sardar gave one more thrust at Bombay citizens when he lamented the vacillating nature of those individuals who took up Khaddar during Civil Disobedience but left it when the movement was abandoned. Still pursuing the golden mean Mr. Vallabhbhai seemed to favour women's participation in public life but under sound Congress leadership. The emphasis on implicit obedience which was so frequently laid by Congress jubilee speakers, reveals that the leaders of that organisation have been shaken by the dissensions which have grown up with the abandonment of civil disobedience. Bombay women were exceedingly fortunate in hearing all three opinions from one political platform.

Indians in South Africa:—Sir Syed Raza Ali, Agent to the Government of India in South Africa, has been going through a crowded programme. A notable speech was made by him on the position of Indians in South Africa to school children in Dundee, Natal. "Go home," said Sir Raza, "and tell your parents that I laid stress on the necessity of Indians learning Afrikaans. You are more South Africans than Indians. You are Indians only in that your grandfather or grandmother was born in India, and you do not interest yourself in India. You must therefore learn to be good South Africans. Let it be South Africa first and South Africa last. For your lot is cast in South Africa." Sir Raza Ali in tendering this wholesome advice has merely asked Indians settled in South Africa to carry out their part of the first Cape Town Agreement. His appeal seems to us to be in conformity with the ideals of the Colonial-Born Association which was inaugurated to voice the feelings of those Indians who, born in South Africa, were in danger of suffering from a repatriation scheme.

Union or Segregation?—We were surprised to read in Indian Opinion a strong condemnation of the Agent's speech on the ground that the chief hope of Indians lay in their strengthening their ties with India. Indian Opinion has, more than any other newspaper, urged the dangers of Indians segregating themselves from other South Africans. It has even objected to the institution of an Indian Agent on the ground that this has reduced the self-reliance of the community and weakened its moral fibre by increasing the dependence of its leaders on an outside agency. It has urged with continued vigour the duty of the South African Union to an integral part of its population. We cannot understand why Indian Opinion should now object in all seriousness to Indians learning Afrikaans in their schools. Indians in South Africa cannot be perpetually employed as interpreters of Indian languages. The South African paper argues that as they are not employed in Government service, a knowledge of Afrikaans is not essential as it is for Europeans. It adds that if the Government enforces the study of Afrikaans then everyone must learn it. But what claim can Indians have to be an integral part of the country if they are ignorant of its principal official language? It is true that eighty per cent of the community born and bred in South Africa with no other home are not given South African nationality. But the solution to this anomalous position is not in turning to India but in pressing for that nationality. Indians in the colonies would be well-advised to look to themselves to an increasing extent for solving their difficulties. The assistance that India can render is after all very limited, and is unlikely to increase in the near future.

The Karnatak Literary Conference:—Mr. N. S. Subba Rao began his presidential address to the Karnataka Literary Conference held in Bombay last week by expressing a doubt about the appropriateness of holding the Conference in Bombay city where Kanarese is not much spoken. Really, however, Bombay is a part of the old Kanarese country which, according to early writers, extended up to the Godavari from the Cauvari. Mr. P. B. Malabari in his "Bombay in the Making" notes that the proclamations of the East India Company used to be made in English and Kanarese. It is true, however, that Kanarese-speaking persons in Bombay of whom there is a considerable number, adopt Marathi unlike the Tamil-speakers who stick to their mother-tongue wherever they may happen to be. Kanarese is perhaps as old as Tamil. In a Greek papyrus of the second century found in Egypt, occur a few words quoted from an Indian language which has been identified with Kanarese. But at the present day Kanarese has not kept pace with the progress made by other vernaculars, perhaps because the Kanarese-speaking people have been dispersed under three separate jurisdictions outside Mysore in none of which they are even a strong minority. Mr. Subba Rao's observation regarding the position of the vernaculars, English and Hindi bears the impress of his wide knowledge of our educational problems, and we reproduce them in this issue.

[Jan. 4

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

BOMBAY, January 4, 1936.

THE NEED OF THE HOUR.

In an editorial note on the Hindu Mahasabha last week we wrote: "We earnestly trust that this session of the Hindu Mahasabha will put aside minor issues and concentrate on the essential need of Hindu Society, namely, vigorous propaganda for the removal of many popular misconceptions of Hindu religion and its promulgation in its purity and simplicity as set forth in the Bhagavad Gita which is recognised as authoritative by all sects." In making the suggestion, we were not unmindful of the difficulty of effecting a sudden transformation of the mentality of the average Hindu Mahasabha member. He sees Hinduism threatened by conversions to Christianity and Islam and by the Communal Award in which Hindu representation in the reformed Legislatures, provincial and Federal, is not only reduced by weightages to Muslims, Europeans and Anglo-Indians but is also weakened by caste and territorial delimitations. Dr. Ambedkar's ultimatum has further frightened them by the prospect threatened, of millions leaving the Hindu fold to swell the ranks of Muslim and Christian voters. That these apprehensions lie at the root of the mentality of the members of the Hindu Mahasabha is evident from the address of Mr. N. C. Kelkar, Chairman of the Reception Committee of the session of the Hindu Mahasabha which was held in Poona early this week. A resolution introduced by Mr. M. R. Jayakar advocating the abolition of caste of which, as we have repeatedly said, outcastes are concomitants, was ruled out as being beyond the purview of the Mahasabha by the President, Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya. We can not quarrel with the ruling so long as we accept Hinduism, as it is popularly understood at present, as true Hinduism which does not stand in need of reform. The great post-Buddhist Acharyas whose commentaries on the Bhagavad Gita form the bases of all present-day sects of Hinduism, were keen on establishing their own philosophic ideas and paid scant heed to the social implications of the Gita doctrines. This omission is responsible for the arrest of social evolution. A society which does not go forward must retrograde. There is no standing still.

What are the social implications of the religion of the Gita? In the first place it wipes the slate clear of the discriminations against women and Sudras which, at sometime, somehow, crept into the Vedic religion. It goes further and enjoins non-discrimination against the lowest of outcastes who eat dog's flesh. The entire teaching is clinched by the declaration that the Supreme Being dwells in all, that all, to use the words of St. Paul, live and move and have their being in Him. Worship of God is divested of ritual and priestly intervention. Whoever offers in a spirit of devotion, a leaf, a flower, water, fruit, is assured of Divine grace. Even the worst sinner need not despair. The moment he experiences devotion to the Supreme Being that moment he is regenerated. Steps are suggested by which one incapable even of a slight effort at self-purification, can gradually train himself to do so. The profound psychology of the Gita is borne out by the discoveries during the last few years of the modern science of psycho-analysis. A broad tolerance pervades the whole teaching. No exclusive claim is made for the worship even of the God of the Gita. All who worship in the spirit of Truth their own accustomed Deity are assured of the same goal. Not only that, but even those do not worship a personal God but are engaged in promoting the well-being of all creatures, they also have an honoured place in the religion of the Gita. In fact, the Gita seems to hold them in special honour but it recommends the worship of a personal God as being more easy for the average man. If it was not the Buddhists and Jains who were referred to, it must have been some earlier school from which they sprang. Turning to more concrete matters, while the Gita dwells on the effect of diet on temperament, it does not attach any similar importance to the company in which one dines. Its conception of caste is the complete antithesis of what caste has come to be. It is not a matter of birth but of qualities, aptitudes. The abolition of caste will no more imperil Hinduism than the abolition of the House of Lords would imperil Christianity or even the Church of England. In the field of politics, the Gita, without prescribing forms of Government, lays down a canon, conformity of which is the final and absolute test of what government should be. For the individual the pursuit of the law of his being, svadharma, is the highest duty. The highest duty of the State is the securing for every one of its subjects of freedom and facilities to grow to the full height of his stature, and that which does this best is the best.

If Hinduism is reformed so as to accord with the simple and sane implications of the Gita, it will become not only powerful within itself but will also eliminate the communal dissensions between Hindus and non-Hindus. The adaptation of Hinduism to Gita principles will not only help India to solve her internal problems. It will also help her to fulfil her mission to the world. In its present distracted state, the West is looking to India and to the Bhagavad Gita in particular, for guidance. In his brilliant book "The Spirit of France" Paul Cohen-Portheim wrote that what would save civilisation at the present-day is the co-operation of Asia and Europe—not the Asia of today which has almost forgotten its own wisdom and is imitating much of what is worst in Europe, but the Asia of the Bhagavad Gita and the Buddha. The identification of the Gita and the Buddha by this writer, shows remarkable insight. The goal of the Gita is Brahma Nirvana. Whether the Brahma was added on by the Gita or dropped out by Buddha is a question of chronology. The identity of several sentiments and even phrases in the Gita and the Dhammapada is remarkable. The West in its search for light has already turned its attention to the Bhagavad Gita. Schweitzer's judgment of the Gita was quoted in a review of his latest book in Hibbert Journal for July: "It is not merely the most read but also the most idealized book in world literature." The Bhagavad Gita is thus India's great medium for communion with the world outside. The socialization of its teaching would be her greatest service to humanity. Since the above was written we have perused in the Times of India on Wednesday the summary of a thoughtful and scholarly lecture delivered by His Highness the Maharaja of Baroda. As International President of the World Fellowship of Faiths His Highness is in a unique position to inaugurate a movement to bring Hinduism back to the Gita and Buddha, as a great step towards making her full contribution to the problems which confront humanity.

277

CONGRESS ORIGINS.

In the account of the origin of the Indian National Congress given by Sir William Wedderburn in his Life of A. O. Hume, there is no mention of the agitation over the Ilbert Bill. The violence of the opposition of the British community and Press in India to this measure of pure administrative convenience, however, was the immediate cause of the realisation by Indians of the need of an all-India organisation to protect their interests. "The Ilbert Bill agitation," writes Ambika Charan Mazumdar in his admirable book Indian National Evolution (Natesan & Co., Madras,) "went a great way towards impressing the Indian races that in the political world success did not depend so much upon men as on organized efforts, and so paved the way to united and concerted action." The Ilbert Bill itself, almost trivial as it was as a measure of reform, would not have seen the light of day but for the absent-mindedness of the then Secretary of State for India, the Marquis of Hartington. Lord Zetland in his biography of Cromer has narrated at some length the story of this extraordinary incident which shows how casually India's destiny was managed in London by one of his predecessors at the India Office. The British officials who were consulted in India did not expect that there would be any opposition from their non-official compatriots in this country to the Bill. It was sent to the Secretary of State for approval before its introduction in the Legislative Council.

It was not regarded as a controversial measure by the India Office staff. But Sir Henry Maine, who was then a member of the India Council and who had served in India as Law Member of the Government of India, wrote a private letter to Lord Hartington warning him that there was serious danger of an outburst of British non-official opinion in India if the Bill was introduced. Sir Henry was then the highest authority on India in England and, if Lord Hartington had seen this letter, he would surely have disallowed the Bill. But the letter was handed to his lordship as he was leaving to attend an important horse race and he thrust the letter unopened into his pocket and forgot all about it. The Bill went to Calcutta with the Secretary of State's sanction and was introduced in the Legislative Council in due course. The British community in India was at once up in arms. The author of Bengal under the Lieutenant Governors, Mr. Buckland, states that "a conspiracy had been formed by a number of men in Calcutta who had bound themselves in the event of Government adhering to the projected legislation to overpower the sentries at Government House, to put the Viceroy on board a steamer at Chandpal Ghat and send him to England via the Cape." As a matter of fact, his biographer says, Lord Ripon himself was not keen about passing the Bill and he was prepared to withdraw it. But the Liberal Government would not agree to that course and it was passed in a much attenuated form.

Wedderburn says that Hume himself was disposed to begin Congress propaganda on the social side but Lord Dufferin, then Viceroy, with whom he took counsel "apparently" advised him to make it a political organization. "Lord Dufferin seems to have told him," he writes, "that as head of the Government he had found the greatest difficulty in ascertaining the real wishes of the people; and that, for purposes of administration, it would be a public benefit if there existed some responsible organization through which the Government might be kept informed regarding the best Indian public opinion. He further observed that, owing to the wide differences in caste, race, and religion, social reform in India required local treatment, rather than the guidance of a national organization. These kindly counsels were received with grateful appreciation by all concerned." Wedderburn does not say positively that his version is the correct one. He does not even seem to have got it directly from Hume himself. This substantially is also the version of W. C. Bonnerjee in his contribution to Indian Politics (Natesan, Madras). Bonnerjee wrote that the Indian National Congress, as it was originally started and was since carried on, was really the work of the Marquis of Dufferin and Ava. As against these high authorities, the attitude of Lord Dufferin himself—he denounced his own reputed creation in a speech soon after at a St. Andrews Dinner—even making allowance for his diplomatic training and methods, as well as some circumstances, make us rather cautious in accepting this version.

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Jan. 4

Professor K. Sundararaman of Madras who attended the first session of the Congress in Bombay and seems to have been in close touch with the events which preceded it, writing in the Congress Jubilee supplement of the Hindu, states that the movement was designed from the first as a political movement and that Lord Dufferin's advice was merely to confine it to India instead of, as Hume intended, making it an agency for disseminating information about India in Great Britain. Before he consulted Lord Dufferin, Hume had done some propaganda in Great Britain, had, in fact, made an arrangement with prominent newspapers there to publish messages sent from India. Wedderburn gives an account of these activities. Hume is hardly likely to have arranged to send to the British Press messages about social reform in this country in which he himself did not till then or afterwards evince much interest. What is more, when a deputation from the Madras Hindu Social Reform Association waited on him some years later and asked him why social reform was kept out of the Congress platform, he gave an answer which showed that he had himself thought out the reasons. He explained that, while he fully appreciated the urgent necessity of social reform to build up the Indian Nation, he felt that a certain amount of self-respect had to be first created in the people in order to arouse them from their lethargy and that this could be more easily done by turning their attention immediately to politics. Dadabhai Naoroji in his address at the second session gave his own reasons for the exclusion of social reform and Telang advanced the theory of the line of least resistance as the one which prompted confining the Congress to political questions. That these reasons did not take into account all the basic facts of Indian life, is clear from the stalemate that we have reached today. Politicians have developed their organization to an extent undreamt of by the founders of the Congress, but social reform blocks the way to the realisation of their aspirations. Raghoonath Rao who, according to Professor Sundararaman's account reproduced elsewhere, had much to do with the calling of the first Congress, constantly complained of the elimination of social reform, which was his own special sphere, from the purview of the national organization.

A Boer Lady's Advice:—It has often been noted that the Indian abroad is freer from the conventions of Indian social life than the stay-at-home Indian. But this is not true apparently of South Africa. Speaking at a banquet in Glencoe given in honour of Sir Raza Ali by the Indian community, Mrs. Botha, wife of the Mayor, severely rebuked Indians for leaving their wives behind. She said, "Why are your women not by your side to-night to take part in this entertainment? You have asked European women to entertain your guest and left your own at home. It is not right, and you must know that unless you change your attitude to your womenfolk your children will suffer." We trust this friendly hint will not be lost on the Indian community in South Africa. The tendency there seems to be to follow the social conventions of the India of two generations ago. Today not a single public function is held here at which Indian women are not invited. The future of the South African Indian will largely be influenced by the opportunities he accords or denies his women to share in the public life of the community.

THE BIRTH OF A NEW NATION.

THE COMMONWEALTH OF THE PHILIPPINES.

For the first time in the history of the Philippines, Malacanán Palace is occupied by a Filipino. President Manuel L. Quezon took up his residence in that historic building, which represents the centre of government in the Islands, after his inaugural parade, November 15. Symbol of the new regime is that Vice-President and Mrs. Garner and former Governor-General (now High Commissioner) Frank Murphy will remain in the Palace for a few days as guests of the first President.

The time of residents of Manila and that of visitors from the Provinces has been occupied to repletion with official, semi-official and social events for the past two weeks. The visiting United States officials—Senators, Congressmen,—newspaper men, Secretary of War Dern, and others have been swept along in a veritable tide of friendly hospitality, sight-seeing, and information-gathering.

The climax was spread out over a whole day, from the great assemblage at the inauguration ceremonies in front of the beautiful Legislative Building with an estimated half-million people in or about the vicinity, to the spectacular Inaugural Ball at night when a Pageant arranged by students of the University of the Philippines depicting the progress of development in the Islands was presented to the thousands assembled.

The association of the United States with the Philippines was skillfully suggested by the appearance of both United States and Filipino flags on either side of the Inaugural Stand, and in the pageant when the young lady representing "Columbia, the Gem of the Ocean" called the lovely Miss Filipinos, standing in statuesque pose within a huge shell, and "The Pearl of the Pacific", down to her side and together, hand in hand, the two proceeded the length of the great open-air amphitheatre.

As the writer wandered throughout the day in the great crowds that gathered everywhere—by beautiful Manila Bay for a magnificent display of fireworks from a barge on the water, to the cross-streets where mounted escorts were passing, among the thousands assembled on the Golf Course built on the site of the old moat surrounding the Walled City, with friends who have lived twenty and thirty years in the Islands, in conversation with total strangers whom he will probably never see again, there was everywhere a sobering sense of new and great responsibilities being assumed.

Sweeping cheers and vociferous applause were almost totally lacking. The crowds everywhere seemed to sense the solemnity of the culmination of events. While there is a very clear-cut knowledge of the economic backgrounds of the present situation, there is a deep-seated satisfaction that the event to which every nation should aspire—a chance to rule its own affairs—has actually taken place.

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

The problem of carrying on the government is not a political problem. There is exceedingly strong evidence that that section of Filipino life will be carried on without much difficulty. The real and pressing problem is one of international economics, particularly the economic relationship of the Islands with the United States. The man who finally accepted the office of Secretary of Finance in the Cabinet is exceedingly capable; but he is greatly worried in having to make up his mind, as to just what the future attitude of the American Congress is to be in regard to such subjects as free trade, reciprocal agreements, tariffs in general.

There is a hope and belief that mutual arrangements can be worked out to the advantage of the Commonwealth of the Philippines and to that of the United States as well. This should be the approach of the American Congress, inasmuch as that body is responsible for deliberately instituting free trade, which worked to the advantage of the Islands and the States, but compelled the Islands to concentrate practically all of their world trade in exports to the United States.

It was decidedly stimulating to watch the setting up of a new democratic form of government in the Far East when so many western nations have abolished that method of dealing with national affairs. It was splendid to see the form instituted in the most peaceful great assemblage we have ever seen. To see the Governors—all Filipinos—with their delegations from the forty-eight Provinces, to witness the change of legislative duties from a bicameral system of Senate and House of Representatives to a single body called the National Assembly, to see the two major political parties coalesce to form a strong support back of the new government, to find American business men pledging themselves to support the Commonwealth, promotes a feeling that this new government has a fine opportunity to succeed, in spite of all the difficulties—real and fancied.

Emilio Aguinaldo has not used his large following to promote disorder. Bishop Aglipay of the Independent Catholic Church, with over a million members, has co-operated in accepting the will of the voters that Manuel L. Quezon should be President and Sergio Osmena should be Vice-President. Manuel Roxas, former speaker of the House of Representatives, well-known in the States as well as in the Philippines, is continuing his strenuous efforts, now promoted over a long period of years, to make a real success of the Commonwealth.

Due to international readjustments—called usually THE DEPRESSION—changes in internal economic structures will be necessary. A right handling of unfairness in the agricultural situation will take care of such as the Sakdalistas who represent some of the agitation for rural reform and for improvement of tenant versus land-owner relationships.

After approximately one hundred Spanish Governors and some sixteen American military and civil Governors, the Commonwealth of the Philippines is starting out on the beginning of an independent career. From 1572 to 1935 is a long period in a nation's history. With only thirty-five of those years devoted in any national way to the promotion of the idea of independence, the Filipino people have made amazing progress in self-development of their national life. There is now a very vital anxiety to be successful in the new effort. The feeling is evidenced in the words of the Philippine National Hymn:

"Ever within thy skies and through thy clouds,
And o'er thy hills and sea,

Do we behold the radiance, feel the throb,
Of glorious liberty."

WALTER BROOKS FOLEY.

THE HINDU LAW OF SUCCESSION : A PROCESS OF EVOLUTION.

The succession to the separate property of a woman called Stridhanam had a direct or indirect bearing on the succession to a man's estate: and so too had the succession to entire estate given to a Sudra's illegitimate sons after his daughter's son. Now taking the latter first, we all know how almost all the Commentators have more erroneously than disingenuously interpreted Yajnyavalkya's passage "widow, and daughters alone, (parents, brother also, their (born) son Gotraja or agnate, Bandhu, disciple, and fellowstudent)" to mean "widow, daughters, and daughters' sons, (etc.); much to the chagrin of grammarians, and historians alike. They forget the immediately preceding significant passage relating to the right of a Sudra's illegitimate son by a female slave to succeed to his entire estate in the absence of any son by his daughters. The preceding passage refers to persons whose status in the family is next to nothing, being a stranger to the gotra, or exceedingly low in the eye of the law. But the succeeding one refers to persons of a superior status equal to that of the propositus himself; but a Putrika-putra stands on a different footing, as he is reserved by an express ritual or implied intention (at the time of his mother's marriage) for her father's family. Even then it is only the first son by her that enters her father's gotra and takes his estate, and not other sons by her, nor the sons by any other daughters. Though they might be remotely capable of offering pinda to their maternal ancestors, that had nothing to do with taking the benefit of their estate or the burden of their family. In fact whoever took the estate, be he Gotraja, Bandhu, or disciple or the king, had to offer, or arrange to offer, the necessary pinda to the departed soul as a duty or in pursuance of a legal charge attached to the estate even as a debt. The Mitakshara school set out the right to take the estate by succession first and then the duty of administering pinda simply followed as a matter of course, which is the reverse of the principle of the Dayabhaga school. But this principle also latterly influenced the right to take the property after the fusion of the Aryan and Dravidian elements in the realm of the law, so much so that the daughter's son supplanted the Putrika-putra and without any further formality or mental reservation (either before or after his birth) right royally walked into the maternal grandfather's estate in the absence of prior heirs. The definition of 'Sapinda' was altered so as to include the daughter's son though an Atma-bandhu. He was styled a Bhinnagotra Sapinda. But this extension of the legal notion was far, far away from the thought of Yajnyavalkya and his predecessors except perhaps Brihaspati. This Deva-guru deliberately took, rather stole, a leaf from his celebrated rival Sukracharya or Usanas who was the guru of the Asuras or Sudra kings of Nanda Dynasty, notwithstanding that the latter Acharya ridiculed the Aryan vanity for purer blood and tradition and picked holes in the supposed rigour of their caste-system, etc. In fact Brihaspati openly yielded to the sustained force of Dravidian impact, though in the plenitude of his power and height of popular estimation nobody could see through the surrender, because of his unique command of argumentative Arthavadas which he was able to press into service in this behalf all along the line of intermediate succession of the sonless man's widow daughter and daughter's son. Thus a unique spectacle was presented to the world of the Deva-guru espousing Dravidian principles and tradition while the Asura-guru waxed so eloquent over the Vedic ones that his verses were verbatim or bodily transported into our Manu in no less than 75 places. And this effect could only be best achieved during the regime of the Nanda emperors, as a matter of evident compromise between the two contending cultures, while the verses referring to strictures on Sudra and things Sudraic got into Manu either at a later time after the overthrow of the Nandas or were explained away to the Nandas born as they were of Sudrawoman by a Brahmin.

We shall now see how Stridhana succession that was also slowly evolved in course of time, in a way prepared the ground for and affected the succession of widow, daughter, and daughter's son. At the outset one may see that Brihaspati after doing so much for the three heirs, never approached the 'untouchable' subject of Stridhanam, because it was foreign to Aryan traditions that women should be held competent to hold or inherit property in their own right, and not in behalf or for benefit of their husbands or sons. It was left to his immediate successor Katyayana, who as the name implies represented the Vaishnava cult of Dravidian or Bhakti worship in temples of a personal God incarnate in avatars or idols. And he freely drew upon the existing Dravidian principles of equity, justice and good conscience, and engrafted them all upon the Aryan Vedic rules in such a dexterous way that the resultant blend was most agreeable to the entire population. It was he that developed the law of Stridhanam in all its kinds and in both of its aspects, limited and absolute. Without entering into all the ramifying details of devolution of Stridhanam it may be for our present purpose sufficient to note that things tended towards what Yajnyavalkya had stated the law to be, namely, daughters in the first instance took their mother's Stridhanam, and their issue on their failure. Thus there was side by side this new kind of inheritance running a race with the Vedic devolution of the primogeniture type. People were getting fast familiar with the daughter, and daughter's children taking their female ancestor's wealth, first in the nature of personal ornaments and clothes worn at her marriage being offered and insisted on being auspiciously worn by her children similarly at their marriages as a sort of visible index of blessing of long-lived matrimony; next in the nature of other kinds of wealth including cattle, utensils, and other moveables; and lastly immoveables in the shape of land and houses, serving for residence and maintenance in the event of the husband deserting or dying or otherwise leaving her destitute. This Stridhanam generally went to the husband in the absence of issue of the marriage in all approved forms while the unapproved forms of marriage were slowly going out of fashion owing to penal and disabling provisions of the ever-advancing and unifying law. There was thus ample room for confusion of ideas. But there was also, when remarriage of women was falling into disrepute and disuse, the further provision in favour of wives without any Stridhanam (to fall back upon) provided for by the husband or father-in-law, of an equal share on partition with that of other male coparceners. In this trend of things Brihaspati's words carried easily and naturally the greatest weight. Thus it is clear that Manu and Apastamba enjoining the adoption of good principles of Dharma from the unexpected quarters of Women and Sudras, had already anticipated the oncoming and irresistible impact of the two civilizations living side by side on the soil of India. And the law of female succession and Bhinnagotra Sapinda's inheritance are but two important instances out of scores that may be easily pointed out on a careful perusal of the ancient law, of vulgar usage creeping into the higher orders of society and into their own law-books.

KANNADA, HINDI AND ENGLISH.*

However intimate and better organized their literary and cultural life may become, the people of Karnataka cannot afford to live in isolation, nor happily can they, from the rest of India. Improved means of communication and the growth of an all-India consciousness in recent years ensure some amount of contact with people beyond Karnataka, specially in the case of those parts of Karnataka, which are administrative divisions of a larger unit of Government. This contact needs to be amplified and furnished with an appropriate medium, which in the present context is linguistic. Our search for a suitable linguistic conduit need not take us far. English is already there, and Hindi is a recent rival. The former has this double advantage in its favour, vis., it is already an all-India language serving both the administration and the educational systems of India, while it is also helpful in establishing cultural contacts with the larger world outside India. It is no doubt true that English is already serving the purpose of a second language through which we are brought into contact with the rest of India, but it is doubtful if an acquaintance with it will ever extend beyond a small number. On the other hand, Hindi is the mother-tongue of a large population, while its variant Urdu is similarly the language of another large group, and in either form, the language can be understood by still another large group. It is claimed, probably with justice, that the language is flexible, and in recent years has undergone developments, which have made it fully capable of meeting all the needs of modern life for adequate expression. There is finally the argument that deliberate efforts have been made to make it the common language of India, and in this department of social life, as in others, the determination of the people is decisive. Therefore, we may accept the position that it is not necessary to go beyond Hindi for a language that will enable us to keep ourselves abreast of cultural movements in India.

A heated controversy has been carried on recently between those who feel apprehensive that the adoption of this sturdy Indian cousin into a family with limited means would seriously reduce the much-needed nourishment for the weakly infant of the family just recovering from a long period of illness and neglect, and the guardians of the wonder-child, some of whom possibly feel towards Kannada as most of us feel when we hear of heavy infant mortality in India—mildly touched by the general phenomenon and seriously apprehensive about our own offspring. It is not my purpose to revive the controversy, but the position I took up at the time and the views I expressed seem to have proved acceptable to both the parties on our side, and I propose to state them, because I have been specially asked by responsible authority on the Hindi side to allay the apprehensions of Kannadigas and also help the cause of Hindi in Karnataka. The first proposition which I have stated in this connection is that Kannada has the first and the paramount claim on us, not because it is our language, but because it is the one medium through which the largest number of people in Karnataka can be reached; consequently, the cultivation of the mother-tongue must always be given precedence. It follows that in schools and colleges, the place of Kannada as a language can never be allowed to be taken by Hindi. It is true that in the Secondary and College stages, English is the first language, and Sanskrit or Arabic is allowed to be offered as an alternative to the mother-tongue of the pupil. Sanskrit and Arabic have special associations for the respective communities concerned, and even those of us who are anxious to support the cause of the mother-tongue in the educational system feel that the claims of these languages have to be respected. Then again, it is not practical politics to substitute Hindi for English in our educational system, at any rate for years to come. Therefore, my second proposition is that the study of Hindi should be encouraged (1) as an optional language in schools and colleges, (2) as a non-examination subject in as many institutions as possible, a short course sufficing for the purpose, and (3) as an important feature of adult education. I am specially concerned with the last, because a large number of educated persons have plenty of leisure, which might innocuously and profitably be employed in the study of Hindi. Besides, cultivation of Hindi by this class will help in the diffusion of all-India ideas in Karnataka. It is a matter for special gratification that increasing numbers of women in Karnataka are taking to the study of Hindi with enthusiasm; for, this means that a love of culture, as well as a sense of Indian solidarity are implanted and reared in what must be the final repository of culture and patriotism—the family circle.

Just now, when I was discussing the question of selecting a second language to promote relationships between Karnataka and India, I made a reference to the view held by an important group of people that English might well be the second language, since it not only serves the purpose of an all-India language but also of a medium of contact with the rest of the world. I propose now to devote some attention to this latter need of the cultural life of Karnataka. There can be no difference of opinion that we in Karnataka like any other local group should not, even if we could, stand on the banks while world currents are racing by. It was argued at a recent Conference of the New Educational Fellowship that the undoubted growth in the solidarity of mankind made it necessary for us "to adopt a single international language, at least as an auxiliary language, in order to facilitate contact between individuals of different nations." If the need for such use of an additional language is accepted, it may be met in one or two ways: "We can either construct a new synthetic language which is to a certain degree artificial; or with the same object in view, we can simplify an existing language."

Now the first solution has taken the form of building up Esperanto, which has many ardent advocates and is held to be both easy to acquire and to use. This solution, however, fails to take note of the existence of non-European languages, and in the present state of our knowledge, whatever the future may have in store for us, it is extremely improbable that a synthetic language can be created, which will serve the needs of communication between the speech-communities of Asia, Africa and Europe. Therefore, the alternative is to select one of the existing languages, and simplify it and adopt it for international commerce. So far as India is concerned, the selection of such a language has been determined for us. English is already in the field, and whatever grievances we may have against Macaulay, we have to admit that the introduction of English into India was in any case inevitable, and even if Macaulay had not made it the language of higher instruction, it would have played an important part in the educational system as well as the cultural life of the people of the country. India would in any case have needed a medium of communication with the rest of the world, and English would not only have been the most available, but also, in view of its widespread use in the larger world, the most useful. Not only this, but literature and culture know no frontiers, and the great minds of a country are really super-national and speak to all nations. A place of pilgrimage may happen to be located in a country, but its appeal lies to devotees all over the world. So also a Shakespeare or a Byron may have lived in England and written in English, but they are leaders of humanity, whose appeal ignores national barriers.

English has not only her own literary wealth to offer, but a knowledge of the language unlocks to us the treasure-houses of other great European languages, like French, German, Russian, and above all, Greek and Latin. Therefore, there can be no question that, if our cultural life is not to be fragmentary and incomplete, the study of English language and literature should find a prominent place in our schools and colleges. There must be a large band of cultivated men and women in Karnataka, whose acquaintance with the English language and literature is both wide and intimate, and whose mission it is to enlarge the scope of our own literature and culture.

THE COMING REVOLUTION.

Soon the world is going to face a revolution different from all the previous ones, both in matter as well as in manner. It would be a revolution of immense magnitude but an organised constructive one which is bound to yield a new and permanent world social order. Through the channels of international communication which science had woven throughout the world, a conscious fellow-feeling had been developing amongst different peoples and they have by now realised that all their interests are common and that true freedom is an international one. When they act—and they were all along waiting to act—they will act all together. And the affairs of mankind when they cross the limits of secluded nationalism, they no longer lean on militarism. Militarism is but an attendant evil on secluded nationalism. As long as nations are unequal and separate, they need military powers either for defence or for offence. But the world as a whole has not formed its government with a military power attending it. Only it is the existence of military powers that invite violent and destructive revolutions. Therefore the coming world revolution would be entirely constructive and positively non-violent.

It is fortunate that it had fallen to the lot of this country to take the initiative towards that movement of constructive non-violent revolution. The history of the Indian National Congress during its recent years has shown that the country is moving towards a new type of nationalism which was absent not only in this country but in any part of the world so long. And there always seemed to be a tug of war between Mahatma Gandhi's conception of nationalism and that of many other leaders. His Swaraj is a cosmopolitan world Swaraj which includes not only Indians, not only Englishmen, but all nationalities and creeds. But the Swaraj of the most of his colleagues is nothing but a new parliamentary constitution minus safeguards and Arms Act. It is not the Gandhi-Irwin pact, it is not Mahatma Gandhi's acceptance to go to the Round Table Conference but it is this fundamental difference between the ideologies of the followers.

and their great leader that has brought about this coma in the growing life of the nation.

But in spite of herself, India is being led from one extreme of degeneracy and slavery to the other extreme of international freedom. This is a choice which she had unconsciously made when she had chosen non-violence as her method of the battle for freedom. Non-violence means abolition of militarism; abolition of militarism means abolition of secluded nationalism, which in its turn means an undiluted internationalism and organised world peace. It is towards this end humanity has been marching all along and now the time seems to be most favourable for realising its objective. Imperialism has seen its limit. And the future war, if at all it should happen, it would be a war between mere jealousies, a war to rob away what had already been acquired by others, a war between a stronger empire and a weaker one. The will to dominate has ceased to pay and imperialism as a movement is in retreat. And the people of all nations have begun to realise that they alone can take care of themselves and that there is no use depending on the diplomatic politician any longer.

It is true Western nations have much developed industrially and a communist ideology is raging amongst the industrial workers of these nations inducing them to capture the whole capitalist machinery at the earliest opportunity and use it for the benefit of the common people. They are waiting for a world catastrophe and are hoping that another world war would produce one or two more Russias. This may happen or may not happen; but the more important nations from the viewpoint of population, dimensions and natural resources, China and India, have not even fairly begun their capitalist industrialisation. And can any Marxian prophet tell us how long these two great nations have to wait, under the threats and subjection of foreign powers, before they could be communised? Perhaps that is not the way.

The socialistic revolution that was preparing itself for ages, is constructive in nature and is based on principles of altruism and true fellow-feeling. It could not translate itself into an actuality because science did not come to its aid so long. This contribution of science which comes purely from Western nations has made the dreams of humanity practicable. And if those great scientists were to live till today and withdraw the rights of using their offerings, we have all to go centuries backwards. Now that science has developed to the full level of universal application, utopias are allowing themselves to be translated into actualities. Knowledge, facilities and aspiration, everything is there. Only the social worker has to make use of them in building the freedom of humanity. And if we could correctly comprehend the implications of the conditions and the circumstances in which the world is locked up today we would be forced to admit that the grand change is imminent. No forces ever died away without action. There cannot be all these facilities and open probabilities of an international revolution without its actually coming into existence. Otherwise how is this colossal poverty going to be removed, how is the human being going to earn his leisure along with his daily bread? How is it that, it is possible to produce electricity on a world scale, yet no where is it used except in a few corners of the world, called cities? There are resources enough to feed and clothe all the living persons sumptuously yet only a minority of human beings enjoy them as privileges. These unnatural and disturbing facts invite the world's impatient activity or 'a mere rush into the vacuum' on the one hand and on the other immediate constructive work towards complete freedom of humanity as a whole. If the methods of achieving that freedom are universally applicable, if secluded nationalism is no longer possible, we must necessarily choose the latter path.

When we speak of freedom, that term should always include equality. Unless equality is established in its full moral sense, there is always cause for war either among nations or among classes. The two great contributions of science are the Press and Electricity. The Press openly challenges all intellectual monopolies and is prone to create an intellectual standard in the average man. And Electricity is prepared to relieve him from the drudgery of toil, aid him as even a helpmate throughout the day and night and give him enough leisure to pursue his intellectual pleasures. Kind nature is there to yield to those who work for her, who help her. The intelligent application of these scientific as well as natural resources on a universal mass scale is the burden of the coming revolution. And it is bound to come. For science and nature are no longer prepared to waste themselves on a selfish few. We hear the humming sound of its approach or perhaps it has already come.

"THIS GREAT FAMILY" BROADCASTS.

Round firesides in homes throughout the British Empire, her sturdy children gathered on Christmas night, drawn together by the common bond of fraternity to listen to the messages of good cheer of their fellow men in distant outposts and the Christmas message of His Majesty the King.

In this great Christmas broadcast, once again arranged by the B. B. C. and aptly titled "This Great Family," India occupied a place of prominence and from the Bombay station an Englishman who has spent many years of his life in social uplift work in an Indian village told the Empire of the conditions of life and how Christmas was spent by his little family. He was Mr. Verrier Elwin. Mr. Elwin said: "Hullo London, here in India it is a quarter past eight in the evening and a calm, starry night as warm as your English June. I have travelled down to Bombay to speak to you from the Gond village of Karanjia where I live—far away among the eastern spurs of the sacred Maikal Hills, ancient home of the great sages of India. On Christmas night in Karanjia a huge log fire blazes in front of a tiny mud chapel of St. Francis. A tall Christmas tree laden with presents glitters in the firelight. All around lies the vast mysterious forest in a deep silence, broken now and again by the distant roar of a tiger or the high melancholy call of the deer. Round the fire gathers a varied company—two or three hundred wild and glorious children of the forest, royal Gonds, with long black hair, and peacock feathers nodding in their turbans. A pathetic group of lepers sits apart. And there is a Muslim, a Brahmin, an 'untouchable,' an Englishman, an Indian Christian, bound by service into a real family-symbol of what might be throughout the world if the message of the Christ-child was taken to our hearts. For though only two of the company are Christians, all are held together by that Christmas love which teaches that a thing has only to be human to be precious, and that where poverty is there Christ would desire to be. For always the Gonds are hungry. The God of Food, they say, has left the forest for the cities where he makes men fat. But at Christmas, at least, the God of Food returns, and all the children and the lepers and as many animals as will come have a great feast. More and more, people gather from their tumble-down huts, and soon they begin the dance of the Karma, famous dance of the new birth of trees."

283

All through this holy night they dance till the dawn comes and they sing an old, old song that might well have a Christmas meaning; for while in the chapel rises the strain of 'While Shepherds watch their flocks by night', the roar of the drums answers and the dancers cry :

O sleeper rise, if thou would'st see,
At midnight, the tree burst into flower.
Tomorrow I shall begin my journey back to them. I wish a Happy Christmas in the name of India to the people of Great Britain and to all those whose lives like mine are spent in the lonely places of the Empire."

REMINISCENCES.*

I began writing for the Hindu shortly before or soon after I took my degree from Kumbhakonam College. The first contribution which I sent was published on the leader page. Of what happened in the editorial sanctum, I was totally unaware till my friend, the late Mr. K. Subba Rao, then Sub-Editor, published his "Revived Memories" two years ago. I was gratified to read that G. Subramanya Iyer when he handed over to Mr. Subba Rao for the first time my manuscript said to him, "Please read this. How fine it is! I have no doubt one of these days this young friend of ours will be one of the most brilliant writers of our time and generation." I wrote often and all that I wrote was published in the editorial page. I may mention here that my writing to the press was extremely distasteful to my father who, a Government official himself, regarded Government service as the only place for respectable people. Writing to newspapers was, in his view, disreputable. At his urgent pressure and on the recommendation of a relative, I found myself seated in a Government office in Madras. But a week of it was too much for me. There was very little to engage the mind in the work which consisted chiefly of making a few entries in a huge register. All the others who sat in the same room with me, took their task easily. They came in a few minutes after the prescribed time, chatted with their neighbours, and made their entries and left punctually as the hour struck for tiffin. They returned after a full hour and waited anxiously for the clock to strike the hour to disperse. They were also letting fall remarks in my hearing to the effect that they did not appreciate my presence among them. When I saw an advertisement for a teacher in the High School conducted by Mr. Subrahmanya Iyer, I jumped at it hoping that my writings in the Hindu would predispose him in my favour. So they did. It was a short interview which I had with him and next day I handed my resignation of my official post to the head of the Department. He was surprised. He told me that I had done in one week what the others took more than a month—though I was conscious only of filling my time with entries in the big book to get over the terrible boredom—and that I was assured of speedy promotion if I continued there. I thanked him but told him that I preferred work in which I felt some interest. As a matter of fact, teaching in a school was not very much to my taste either. I was interested in the boys and I came to learn many years later from one or two of them that they had derived some benefit by their contact with me in the school. I became Headmaster, and one of my first measures was to do away with the promiscuous caning which formed part of the system in those days. I sent round a circular that there should be no canes with any teacher. I was told that it was impossible to carry on the classes without the disciplinary instrument. As a compromise, I agreed to inflict the torture myself, if and when it was necessary. Every day I was called to one class or another but, as a rule, I managed to restore peace without punitive measures. On one occasion, however, I was obliged to become executioner, and each boy in the class received a stroke on his hand. When I was in the middle of this function, the boy whose turn it was next to receive a stripe, called out excitedly, "Sir, I am a married man!" I was completely taken aback. At the boy's exclamation, a picture arose before my mind of a young woman looking at me with reproachful eyes from behind him. I threw away the cane and left the room. I do not think I ever used it afterwards. So far as results at the examinations were concerned my Headmastership was a complete failure. No wonder. Much of my time was taken up with writing for the Indian Social Reformer, the Hindu and the Indian Spectator in Bombay, Mr. B. M. Malabari having asked me to write for it during his visit to England. When K. Subba Rao left the Hindu to join the Mysore Service, I stepped into his place my senior being C. Karunakara Menon. Menon was a very careful and conscientious writer. He was in charge of the Hindu when Mr. Subrahmanya Iyer went to England to give evidence before the Welby Commission. The first prosecution of Mr. Tilak for sedition occurred during his editorship and Mr. Karunakara Menon's criticisms, especially of the legal aspects of the case—it produced the famous definition of "sedition" by Justice Strachey—made the Hindu widely appreciated. When Subrahmanya Iyer returned he told Karunakara Menon that he was gratified to hear the Hindu articles spoken of highly everywhere. It has been sometimes said of those who worked under Subrahmanya Iyer that they were trained by him. He did very little by way of training. He never told me what I should write about or how. I do not remember except on two occasions when any reference was made by him to what I had written. He was not given to praising his staff, not that he was wanting in appreciation, but he knew the staff did not need praise. On one of the occasions he said, not so much to me as in my hearing, that the Hindu editorial paragraphs were spoken of as rivalling those of the Pioneer, it being then reputed the foremost Indian journal. It was said that high officials, including a Lieutenant Governor, were contributing to its columns. The other occasion was about the use of "it" for "so." When I next day showed him a standard book in which it was so used, he remarked that I need not have taken all the trouble about so small a matter. What we learnt from him was, however, of great value. It was his complete detachment from personal feeling and entire concentration on the merits of a subject in the editorials. Friend or opponent, it was all the same to him. While he sat in the editorial chair, he knew neither. I am glad to think that this tradition is being maintained not only in the Hindu but in the papers conducted by those who worked with Subrahmanya Iyer. I left the Hindu at about the same time when Subrahmanya Iyer left it.

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Jan. 4

A MADRAS VERSION OF CONGRESS ORIGINS.

(BY PROF. K. SUNDARARAMAN).

[Prof. K. Sundararama Aiyar, the veteran scholar and educationist was one of the active delegates from Madras to the first Session of the Indian National Congress.]

In December 1883, the annual convention of the Theosophical Society met at Adyar and attracted a large number of delegates from all parts of India. This caused surprise everywhere as the Theosophical Society came over to India as an organisation started in America and brought over here by its founders as affording the best means of attracting to its side the adherents of the ancient spiritual philosophy and methods of spiritual realisation which were still faithfully studied and pursued here and there among those who followed the methods of the Brahmagyana, among the various Vedic sects, still existing in India.

Diwan Bahadur Ragunatha Rao, who had already joined the Theosophical Society and now attended the convention, was a man of highly progressive views in all matters connected with Indian politics and social culture. Inspired by the example of the convention, he got up a special meeting of his friends in his house later on and determined with their approbation to find ways and means of bringing together Indian politicians to inaugurate a political movement for the regeneration and reform of the methods of government of this country calculated to promote a future Indian advance towards Swaraj.

Mr. A. O. Hume, who after his retirement from the Civil Service had settled in Simla, came into contact with Col. Olcott and Madam Blavatski and the story of Mrs. Hume's lost brooch and Madam Blavatski's intervention are incidents which might be mentioned en passant. Upon being informed about the loss of the brooch, Madam Blavatski promised to show the brooch to Mrs. Hume, if she could get at it as she hoped to do, but enjoined that no attempt should be made to either get possession of it or view it at close quarters. At one of the daily meetings of her European friends of an evening, Madam Blavatski suddenly left the gathering, walked some distance and returned after having secured the brooch from an 'elemental' with which she was then supposed to be in close communion. But this by the way. While still at Simla, Mr. Hume paid frequent visits to Lord Dufferin who had just then arrived in India as successor to Lord Ripon. During one of these visits, the conversation turned upon Mr. Hume's aspiration for shaping and influencing English public opinion so as to start a movement for India's political unity and regeneration. Mr. Hume's idea was to rouse the conscience of the people of England by carrying on a persistent agitation in Great Britain with the support and encouragement of leading friends of India both among Englishmen and Scotchmen whether or not officially connected with India. Lord Dufferin considered the question from a purely private sympathiser's point of view and expressed his opinion that such an agitation in England was foredoomed to failure as all intelligent Englishmen were fully aware of the advantages of all kinds, economic, political, administrative, etc., which Great Britain derived from her huge and passive Indian dependency. He also convinced Mr. Hume that the latter could secure his own aims best by confining the agitation to India for the present and making Indian public men all over the land to start and organise and develop to its full strength a national organisation in India itself and conducted with zeal and discretion by her own leaders under Mr. Hume's sympathetic and courageous lead.

*Hindu Congress Jubilee Supplement.

Diwan Bahadur Ragunatha Rao's idea had by now spread among all political associations and politicians in various parts of India. Throughout 1884 and even 1885, the idea of a national political organisation intensively and continuously devoted to the advancement of the future political status of India within the British Empire was a leading topic of discussion both in the press and on the platform in the land. The enthusiasm of the politicians and other public men manifested themselves not only in the formation of popular associations like the Indian Association of Calcutta, the Poona Sarvajanik Sabha and the Madras Mahajana Sabha to name only a few, but also in strengthening Mr. Hume's own persistent resolve to carry on the agitation for India coming into her own. Mr. Hume immediately went to Bengal and induced the leaders of the Calcutta Indian Association, which was then under the guidance of Baboo Surendranath Bannerjee, to pursue the public aims which he had already determined upon propagating throughout the length and breadth of India and her people. It was at this stage that he issued a pamphlet called "The Old Man's Hope." It was at first distributed chiefly in Bengal but numerous copies found their way into all other parts of India and broadcast Hume's ideas for the political advancement of India. The Madras Mahajana Sabha was in full swing having been started by Messrs. P. Rangiah Naidu, G. Subramania Aiyar, P. Ananthachari, Veeraraghavachariar and others and had held some political conferences, both in the presidency town and in mofussil centres like Kumbakonam. It was about this time that Mr. Hume was active and though he directly worked among the people of Bengal, active politicians in all parts of the country took up his ideas and worked for their advancement. Mr. Hume's idea was originally to make Poona the permanent centre and abode for the establishment of the proposed Indian National Congress, as the place had long been the centre of the political activities and agitation of the leaders of the Sarvajanik Sabha. Several gentlemen at Poona became actively interested in organising the resources and personal activities needed for the holding of the Congress there.

MISSIONARY PLANS.

Sixty delegates coming from twenty-five National Christian Councils met at Northfield, Connecticut, September 27—October 2, 1935 to review the work of the preceding three years and to plan for the ensuing period.

The missionary enterprise has come now to the dawn of a new age in which fresh forces are beginning to play a momentous part. These forces are challenging the fundamentals of historic Christianity. In view of such a situation there came to the Conference the conviction of the necessity for a World Meeting to be held in 1938 in the Far East where a new sense of Christian world solidarity could be gained.

A thorough study of evangelism on the mission field is to take a central place in the activity of the International Missionary Council with a view to vigorous, concerted, aggressive and continuous evangelism by the Churches. The survey is to be centred in the Church aiming at enlisting voluntary lay and pastoral forces. The preparation, holding and follow-up of the 1938 meeting is therefore to be utilised to promote fuller co-operation in the world missionary enterprise. Hitherto co-operation has not so often been extended to large evangelistic ventures. It has also been mainly an activity of missionary societies rather than of indigenous churches. Vigorous studies of all these processes and of concrete projects of fresh practical co-operation are being set afoot. Professor Latourette declared in this connection that if Christians plan in any less terms than reaching every last creature on this globe they are untrue to the commission of Jesus.

Dr. Merle Davis, Director of the Department of Social and Industrial Research analysed the problem created by the impact of industrialism upon primitive peoples. His department was invited to move its office to the far East to prepare through social economic studies for the 1936 Conference. The following studies, preparatory to the Conference, were suggested: (1) A more adventurous and far-reaching programme of co-operation. (2) The creation of a well-trained Christian ministry and help for their continued spiritual growth and the efficiency of their service. (3) The organisation and spiritual strength of the indigenous church including its support by the local Christian communities. (4) The relation of the Church to Christian movements outside the framework of the Church. (5) The relation of Christianity to other religious cultures. (6) The need of the Church in each land to become truly integrated to such elements in the cultural inheritance of the people as are congruous with Christianity. (7) The need for the Church in each land to realize itself as a part of the world-wide Christian community. (8) The place and function of the Christian community in secular society.

The following startling problems were flung into relief by these same representatives as they confronted the new secular world forces:—(a) The economic basis of the Church in view of the present situation. This is especially a problem in India and in other countries where large masses of Christians are proletariat. (b) The relation of Christianity to the changing social and economic order. (c) The relation of the Church to modern challenges such as communism and imperialism. (d) The problem of church and State in the various manifestations which it assumes in different countries, including questions relating to education, its development and control.

The Committee finally decided to hold the world conference in the autumn of 1938 at Kowloon, in China. Four hundred delegates are to be sent, allotted to thirty areas. Over two hundred will be nationals of these areas, with some seventy missionaries, and the remainder will be from other parts of North America, while every national Student Christian Movement in the world will be asked to send a student delegate.

PUBLIC SCHOOL IN INDIA.

Last month Lord Willingdon opened the first Public School at Dehra Dun. In his speech he criticised the University Education in India and called it soul-less and bereft of any contact with life. Lord Willingdon hoped that the managers of the school would see that the education given to the pupils in the school would be soul-ful and constructive. The curriculum of the school is based on the famous Public Schools of Great Britain; Eton and Harrow are the models. Mr. Foot, the Headmaster, and his four English colleagues are to bear the responsibility of forming the character of the future rulers and administrators of India. It is a grand scheme on which millions of pounds will be spent, by the State and by private individuals. We wonder if the expenditure on this costly experiment is worth incurring. Does India want education modelled on Eton and Harrow? Have they a soul to spare? The progressive thinkers in this country have come to the conclusion that the sooner Public Schools are closed the better it will be. The product of the Public School is much more detached from the realities of life than the product of the Universities.—Indian Bulletin.

NOTES

Pandit Jawharlal Vindicated:—In the Reformer of December 21, we published Pandit Jawharlal Nehru's repudiation of the accusation in the Bengal Administration Report against him of having recommended to Bengal leaders the carrying on of a socialist agitation under the guise of an anti-untouchability movement and with money collected for Harijan work. The Pandit protested that, whatever he might have been guilty of, he had never indulged in duplicity in his work. He declared that the allegation in the Administration Report was absolute falsehood and challenged the Government of Sir John Anderson either to justify the charge or publicly withdraw it and express regret for it. Such demands have been made by others—for example, political detainees—but have not been met on the ground of "public interests." We expected that the Pandit's challenge would be disposed of similarly. It is, therefore, a most agreeable surprise to see that the Bengal Government have not resorted to this excuse in this case. The strong language in which the Manchester Guardian and the New Statesman supported the Pandit's demand, may have had some influence in securing a response. But such strong comments have passed unnoticed before. We are obliged, therefore, to think that the compliance of the Bengal Government in this instance is due to the change of heads at the India Office, the present Secretary of State being a former Governor of Bengal whose knowledge of the people was derived not solely from Police Reports. The Bengal Government have not in so many words withdrawn the grave imputation made against a man whom even those who differ from his opinions respect highly for his sterling honesty of purpose and transparent sincerity. It is explained that the writer of the Report drew certain inferences which he mistook for facts and stated as facts and for this the Government of Bengal express their regret. Pandit Jawharlal has accepted the explanation and expression of regret. But the matter is not one between the Pandit and the Government of Bengal. The Administration Report is published under the authority of Government and a sentence in a prefatory note that they are not responsible for all the statements made in it, does not absolve them of their responsibility. A similar reservation is made in newspapers but a Court of Law would not on that ground relieve an editor of responsibility for everything that is published in his paper. We are surprised that the Government of Bengal should have resorted to this pettifogging excuse. As for the plea that the writer mistook his inference for a fact, a journalist who did that would be mulcted in heavy damages or may be even sent to jail. We welcome, none the less, the Bengal Government's parenthetical remark that Administration Reports are intended to do nothing more than give an accurate picture of current events. The Reports on the Moral and Material Progress of India which used to be presented to Parliament by the Secretary of State for India, before the Government of India started a Publicity Department, were models of accurate and lucid statement and we should much wish them to be revived in place of the monographs on India by Directors of Information who can not be called to account like other writers.

Congress and Liberals:—The Right Honourable Srinivasa Sastry has publicly extended on behalf of the Liberal Party his hand of goodwill to the Congress. We trust that it will be responded to in the same generous spirit in which it is made. As Mr. Sastry said, the National Congress is not only the oldest but it is also the largest political organisation in India. It has to its credit much solid work and sacrifice in the country's interests. Since the suspension of the Civil Disobedience movement and the removal of the ban on Council entry, there is no vital point of difference so far as politics are concerned between Liberals and Congressmen. The differences, such as they are, relate to matters like the wearing of khaddar and the performance of a certain amount of what is known in Congress parlance as manual labour. An increasing number of Congress members is dissatisfied with these limitations to Congress membership. The manual labour clause, adopted last year, has proved unworkable and it is almost sure to be repealed at the next session.

The khaddar clause is out of place in the constitution of a predominantly political organisation. The All India Spinners Association is an independent body and, with the large funds at its disposal, it should be able to carry on its propaganda without the adventitious aid of a political patron. There is one other difference between Congressmen and Liberals. It is as regards the goal to be set before the country as the end of its political activities. The Congress has set up Independence or substance of Independence as its goal. The Liberals cling to Dominion Status as their objective. Mr. Sastry has asked that Congress should drop Independence. We would suggest that Liberals should drop Dominion Status. Neither Independence nor Dominion Status is a sufficient end in itself. The question, whether India should remain within or without the British Commonwealth, is not an issue which can be decided on abstract considerations. Even if it were one, it can be decided only with reference to the larger issue of India's position in and her capacity for service to the world at large. It is obvious that the British connection, if it operates to suppress India's genius and aptitudes for world service, will become obnoxious to world opinion. Recent events have shown that world opinion is a force with which even a great power like Britain will have to reckon. On the other hand, if India is completely unhampered by the British connection in her efforts to serve humanity, there is nothing to be gained by making the breaking of it an end to which the nation's energies should be concentrated. On the contrary, India's yearning to take her due share in world affairs, will only be strengthened by her established position in the British Commonwealth.

Social Reform Among Nambudiris:—If the Zamorin Raja expects that his ban on temple entry will deter progressive Nambudiris from pressing forward with social reform which alone can rescue them from the decadence due to outworn customs imposed on them by their exclusive eminence, he is doomed to early and complete disillusionment. The Nambudiri Yogaksaema Mahasabha (Nambudiri Social Welfare League) met at Trichur near Cochin on the 28th December for its twenty-eighth annual session. For the first time in its history, it had for President a woman, Srimathi Parvathi Nanminimangalam. After prayers by another Nambudiri Brahman lady, Srimathi Arya Antharjanam, the Chairman of the Reception Committee called public attention to the action of the Cochin Government in repeatedly vetting a Bill to control the powers of the Karavan or manager of a Nambudiri family, who at present exercises absolute control over the family possessions. The Lady President in her address, explained her non-participation so long in the League's work as being due to her dissatisfaction with its failure to deal satisfactorily with the crying evil of discarded women of the caste. Only the eldest son in a family is allowed to marry and her remark apparently refers to women who, on account of this feudal prohibition, have been stranded in life. The President went on to say that her community had progressed in recent years. The women threw away the old-fashioned umbrellas which they were obliged by custom to carry with them. Grown up girls were attending schools in increasing numbers. She declared that Nambudiri women should be given the right to remarry and to sever themselves from unwholesome marriages. She exhorted her people to give up cowardice and work for the uplift of the community. The report in the West Coast Reformer to which we are indebted for these interesting particulars, might have been fuller and more detailed, having regard to the significance of this important movement in the most conservative of Hindu castes.

Hosts and Guests:—While in some respects, Poona was advantageously situated to hold the last sessions of the Hindu Mahasabha, it was in one important matter quite unsuited for the purpose. This is the persistence in the city of the rather narrow tradition of the Peishwa's regime which brought the Empire built up by the genius of Shivaji to an untimely and rather inglorious end. The characteristics of that regime were cleverness in diplomacy, plenty of personal courage, and an exceptionally clear vision within a horizon limited by cast-iron sacerdotal ideas. Its great defect was an incapacity to think spaciouly. In such an atmosphere the idea of Hindus being the hosts and all other communities being guests of the Hindus, comes naturally even to a mind attuned to the philosophy of the Vedanta. The simile is nevertheless a double-edged one. According to Hindu ideas a guest is entitled to have the best of everything in the host's house served to him. To haggle over weightages in the electorates, would be the height of inhospitality. If it was meant by the simile to assert a right of exclusive ownership to anything, it would justify the similar claim made by other communities which are relegated to the position of guests. That single declaration, which should have been promptly repudiated but was not, has brought on the Mahasabha an ill-deserved odium at the moment when its importance was coming to be felt by many who had hitherto looked askance at it.

The Women's Conference:—The most successful of the annual conferences held in Christmas week is usually the Women's Conference which presents a united front to the country. The tenth session which met at Trivandrum under the presidentship of Her Highness Maharani Setu Parvati Bayi, is notable from all accounts, as the best organised of the Women's Conferences. We print elsewhere the thoughtful and well-considered presidential address of the Maharani. Both Travancore and the women's Conference have gained much from their close association this year. The presence in Travancore of distinguished Birth Control propagandists,

Like Mrs. Margaret Sanger and Mrs. Howe-Martin, who attended the Conference as visitors, gave special interest to the Birth Control resolution. Following its usual, out-of-date policy, the Conference kept out the press but at this session the question was put to the vote, a large majority favouring an in camera sitting. Mrs. Sanger was invited to address the house on Birth Control before the resolution was voted on. An amendment to link up Birth Control and maternity welfare had to be abandoned, we understand, because the distinction between this suggestion and the official resolution was felt to be too subtle for the Conference. This was unfortunate as the Birth Control movement has no future except as a section of maternity work. Much of the opposition now experienced would have been dispelled if a representative body like the Women's Conference had clearly decided for this step. Dr. B. Natarajan, Delhi delegate and Superintendent of Municipal Welfare work in that city, speaking on the resolution, said: "As a part of maternity and child welfare service the object of which is to reduce infant and maternal mortality, Birth Control is definitely necessary. The existing welfare centres which are in close touch with the people through their health visitors, know only too well the need for instructing some of the mothers in the practice of Birth Control and helping them to follow the advice. Their work is gravely handicapped by the absence of facilities and authority to impart this knowledge. The assimilation of Birth Control by the maternity centre is an urgent necessity which cannot be neglected today. It will, besides filling up a gap in the welfare work of Indian cities, check the number of induced abortions by the use of quack methods which is common. But it will not solve every problem as is claimed by enthusiastic propagandists. Birth Control is not going to bring about an Utopia. In a world where babies are not the only trouble, much more has to be done than the mere establishment of Birth control clinics."

The Congress Socialist:—We welcome the resuscitation of The Congress Socialist although to many the double name will be perplexing. For we all know what the Congress stands for and many of us have at least a vague idea what Socialism is. But what 'Congress Socialist' represents is not so clear. It may mean, and often does, that Socialist who is a thorn in the side of older Congressmen. It has also meant the Socialist who owes an allegiance to the Congress or vice versa. In any case one might safely look to the organ of the party to clarify the position soon. The paper does well to carry on its first issue several appeals for unity in Socialist ranks. For while Comrades Meherally and Masani moved in the Bombay Corporation for felicitations to the Congress on its Golden Jubilee but abstained from attending the functions, Comrade Maniben Kara took a prominent part in the celebrations, and workers at Delhi nearly wrecked the Jubilee programme by holding back from it in a body. Even in the first number of The Congress Socialist itself there seems a noticeable lack of unity. While General Secretary Jayaprakash Narayan writes from Benares on the need for a paper to work as a party-builder, Poet Harindranath Chattopadhyaya who celebrates his return from Sri Aurobindo Ghose's Ashram at Pondicherry with a poem summarily rejecting the gods, claims that everything has been done already and that 'we are not now as before.' More cautious than frenzied Nasik agitators who express their contempt of Hindu scriptures by burning them publicly, Comrade Harin merely wishes to 'let them be left on the shelves to be buried in dust through the days,' very probably to be dusted and read when the next attack of religious fervour comes on us again. Comrade Harin's poetry has suffered from his politics but we like particularly the lines

Each one of us hears in his blood
The music that makes him a master;
We keep rolling along and along

Like an ocean whose billows are wide.

Lest readers ignorant of the context should rashly conclude that the 'New Song' is a tipsy chorus, we hasten to add that it is in celebration of the freeing of the workers from exploiters. Bursting forth once more in the third number of the weekly, the poetic comrade extols the virtues of blowing one's own trumpet. We wish the Congress Socialist every success but we trust it will cut out the rhyming contributions.

Which Sir Shanmukham?—Until a man can be found who knows himself as his Maker knows him, sees himself as others see him, there must be at least six persons engaged in every dialogue between two, wrote Oliver Wendell Holmes—an observation which comes to mind on reading Sir R. K. Shanmukham Chetty's confession at the Madras Christian College annual celebrations that he was what he was today because of the influence of that institution. Leaving aside the audience who had met on the occasion, still there is room for doubt as to which Sir Shanmukham the speaker referred to—the one known to his Maker, the one seen by his opponent in the last Assembly elections, Sami Venkatachallam Chetty, or the one revealed to Sir Shanmukham alone. But for his defeat in the elections Sir Shanmukham would not have been what he is today. He would probably have been elected President of the Legislative Assembly. Would he in that case have preferred the Dewanship of Cochin? The Presidentship of the Indian Legislative Assembly, is certainly, a far more elevated office than the Dewanship of Cochin. Sir Shanmukham lost the chance of reoccupying it owing, it was generally felt, to a certain lack of restraint in his electioneering speeches, which cannot be recorded as due to the influence of the Madras Christian College under Dr. Skinner.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

BOMBAY, January 11, 1936.

MAHARAJA SAYAJI RAO GAEKWAR.

The completion of sixty years since the accession of His Highness Sayaji Rao to the throne of the Gaekwar was celebrated with due pomp and solemnity and much genuine rejoicing at Baroda for several days beginning from New Year's Day. Accounts of the great achievements of His Highness's rule have been published in the Press. His Excellency the Viceroy arrived at Baroda for the occasion and at the State banquet held in his honour read a message from the King-Emperor conveying His Imperial Majesty's congratulations and good wishes in words of marked cordiality. The Viceroy in his speech offering his own felicitations, said that His Highness's succession to the gadi in 1875, marked the beginning of a new era of material and steady progress in the State. His Excellency continued: "Under Your Highness' enlightened guidance Baroda has never looked back. At the outset Your Highness set before you high ideals, some of which have already been attained, others you steadfastly pursue. And I can truly say that you have devoted your life to the interests of your State and the welfare of your subjects. The fruits of your labours are in evidence on all sides. The administration of the State is on a high level, but what is perhaps more important, it is built upon sure foundations." Special significance attaches to this testimony as Lord Willingdon was Governor of Bombay twenty-three years ago when Baroda and its ruler were under the darkest cloud which cast its shadow during the Maharaja's rule. That His Highness' purpose and motives have come to be understood and appreciated at their true high value, and that His Imperial Majesty and his Viceroy have felt that it was due to His Highness that they should bear public testimony to the fact in gracious and glowing terms, should be most gratifying to the Maharaja as it is to his countrymen.

There is one sentence in the Viceroy's speech which marks the unique standing that Baroda during His Highness' rule has acquired in Indian polity. His Excellency declared that he was glad that he was able to visit Baroda to pay his tribute of regard to His Highness and Her Highness and he asked the company to join him in wishing long life and prosperity to Their Highnesses and the Baroda State. A long and rigid convention has precluded any public reference by representatives of His Majesty to the wives of ruling Princes at State functions. This, no doubt, originated in respect for what was considered to be the etiquette of Indian Courts. Baroda is the only State where this old practice has been departed from and the Maharani officially and publicly recognised as the sharer of her husband's status as ruler of a State as in European countries. The keynote of the Maharaja's policy for his State is to be found in his passionate devotion to social reform. Hindu Society has been held back in the path of progress by a stupid sentiment against women and Sudras as being of sinful origin. The breaking down of this degrading prejudice is in one way or another the aim of Indian social reform. It has been the dominating aim of the Maharaja Sayaji Rao Gaekwar. The social reformer's mission begins with his own home. The notable success which has happily crowned the Maharaja's labours for his State, owes not a little to the example he has set in his own practice. The besetting evil of Indian Princes is the zenana system. By emancipating himself and his family from this traditional bondage, His Highness released the State from the medievalism which hampers progress all over India. Baroda by size and population is not one of the largest Indian States. It has won its place among the foremost of them by the social and educational advance which, in a sense, His Highness forced on her through his long reign. One of the decided advantages which monarchical Government enjoys over the democratic, is that it gives a good ruler sufficient time to advance the interests of his people by measures which require continuous care in their application. It is immune from electoral vicissitudes with their tendency to swing the pendulum this way and that.

The names of Amanulla Khan and Kemal Ataturk come to mind when we think of rulers of States who regarded social reform as the foundation of a modern State and endeavoured to carry it out in their own States. Amanulla failed because he had not the patience to fashion his tools and to prepare the minds of his people by education to understand and give an intelligent assent to his beneficent measures. Ataturk has succeeded in carrying through more radical reforms than any ruler has attempted in modern times because a large body of Turks were habituated by their contiguity to Europe to modern ideas and modes of thinking. He had, too, the powerful support of a victorious Army. The ruler of Baroda had neither of these advantages. But he is fortunate in having for his subjects a highly intelligent and educable people who soon overcame their first feelings of distrust, and threw themselves whole-heartedly in the furtherance of his plans when they realised their value to the public weal. Baroda stands today in the forefront of Indian progress on all lines. Her Maharaja is not only an All-India figure but he holds a high international position as leader of a movement making for understanding and goodwill among nations. He is the International President of the World Fellowship of Faiths which is to hold its second session in London next May. His address at the first session in Chicago two years ago made a great impression and led to his being chosen to the highest position in this great movement. The Maharani is a pioneer and most active leader of the women's movement which is the outstanding feature of Indian evolution at the present time. The weight of Baroda will be certainly cast on the side of social advance in the Federation whenever it comes. We join in the immense volume of congratulation and good wishes which has greeted the Maharaja Sayaji Rao Gaekwar on the Diamond Jubilee of his beneficent rule.

THE HINDU LAW OF SUCCESSION: A PROCESS OF EVOLUTION.

From the concise statement in the two previous articles, one of two things is very clear, especially as Manu contains all the above provisions except as to the widow's inheritance which was the last to emerge. Either Manu was the common Imperial and standard Code for all India of a particular period and the several other Smritis served as the special or local codes for the several provinces; or our Manu went on increasing in bulk by numerous amendments and repeals from time to time until it stopped so growing after the sovereign empire declined in its power to legislate for the whole of India. In the former case it is presumed that some provinces were progressive and some lagged behind in the matter of the evolution of inheritance laws, and the special codes prevailed over the general in actual administration though the general Code of Manu showed the line of universal or uniform development of law through the length and breadth of India. A similar spectacle is being witnessed to-day in the desire to have the same uniform law in the Indian States as in British India. This would be possible only if all the provinces were under the rule of the same king or Emperor or a common consciousness of homogeneity of all peoples arose in the minds of the learned sages. It is not hard to believe, considering the great legal and literary activity of the period in question, that even the law of property which is the slowest to move onward, began, like the law of adoption as administered and incredibly enlarged by our courts, within the last 80 or 100 years, to grow in all dimensions of perspicuity, uniformity, and steadiness, under the able lead of State Officers of the type of Brihaspati and Sukracharya. The former represented the Daiva or Brahmanic forces and the latter the Dravidian or Asura influences. Manu seems to embody a happy but inevitable compromise between the two of them. And all other Smritis took the cue and in fact like Manu drew very largely upon the latter sources for all available and enduring or broadening principles of equity to be engrafted upon the old and out-of-date Vedic Law and Usages. Thus it was that a fresh and vigorous lease of life that has since stood the test of at least two millenniums was given to the old Aryan institutions of India.

Taking the clue from Manu itself and Parasara that the Dharmas of all the four Yugas or distinct ages are comprised in the works of Smriti writers, there is room for the second alternative aforesaid, viz. the gradual but rapid development of the law, probably under the auspices of a dynasty of very able and ambitious line of Kings or Emperors. Now one thing is clear; viz. that Manu does not refer to the widow's right to take her husband's property, though Smriti Chandrika might assert that her right is 'inferrible' from Manu. The fact is that the spirit of Commentators and Digest-makers has throughout been so to interpret, without the least reference to historical sense, as to twist and torture the conflicting texts into yielding fairly harmonious, though sometimes most grotesque, results. Mayne is right in saying, "The growth of a widow's right of succession is much more complicated than that of mother or daughter. Originally of course she shared in the general incapacity for inheritance which affected all women. Neither Manu, Apastamba, Vasishtha, nor Narada recognise her right as heir; though they do acknowledge that of the daughter and mother....." But he would not or could not see the real reason that was winking at him closely. He, in another place, almost knocked against it in para 556. The rule that father, husband, and son were to protect a woman in the stated order was rigidly enforced in the earliest times and women were also regarded pure and sacred and blessed and gifted by the Gods. Remarriage was freely resorted to in the case of young widows with no issue; and where they had issue the same supported them but where they had none, or none survived them, their property went to them or they themselves had recourse to adoption of various kinds of sons who inherited the property and maintained them. And the special injunction was that a mother, though fallen or outcaste, must be maintained by their sons at their peril. Hence there was no necessity to endow the widow with an estate of her own; nay, there was also direct authority of Kautilya that she lost even the Stridhana which she forfeited to her issue on her remarriage, even though it had been mainly intended for her support in times of unforeseen calamity. The strong desire for having sons to save a Hindu from the hell of 'Put'; the dozen extra ways of securing them; the endowment of Stridhana; the duty of the head of the house or other heir succeeding to the estate to support the deceased member's dependants, the unqualified duty of a son to support his mother, even though fallen; and the free right to remarry which the widows and other women had in several contingencies, all these things conspired to delay the rapid advent of the widow's estate in the evolution of Hindu Law. Gautama allowed it if she liked to have a son by Niyoga at the hands of her brother-in-law on special appointment; but that is not a widow's estate or inheritance proper, and Manu supports the same by enjoining the rearing of a son upon a brother's widow and giving him the deceased's estate. Sankha-Likhita endorses the rule, in the case of the eldest widow. Devala postpones it to the rights of father, brother, and mother. And Harita allows maintenance to young widows who, declining to marry again, prefer to lead the life of a rigorously chaste widow. Thus it is fairly certain that, before Brihaspati, Katyayana, and Yajnyavalkya and Vishnu firmly established her right to succeed to her husband's estate, the free right of a widow to remarry was already fast disappearing at least among the higher castes. So that from this point of view it also appears that the chronological order of the Rishis was that Gautama, Devala, Sankha and Harita preceded the four noted above.

The strictures in Manu against Sudras were evidently born of experience under the Nanda dynasty. There seems to have been a duplication of institutions, one led by Sukra under the imperia Sudra kings, and the other by Brihaspati under feudal kings of royal blood subject to complete Brahmanic influences. There had already been ample fusion of Dravidian and Aryan ideas and culture: but now special emphasis came to be laid on particular elements in the product of the fusion. Hence only the stigma attached to Sukracharya as the Asura-Guru. Nevertheless his verses have found their due place in Manu. Manu went on growing by additions, etc., until the days of the Acharyas were practically over and Kautilya came upon the scene and ruled that in approved forms of marriage, a woman lost her right of divorce and re-marriage, but gave her the so-called widow's or woman's estate in her husband's property so long as she strictly adhered to a life of chastity, continence and submission to her husband's relations; and after her life-time his heirs took his wealth. And it is no wonder that Kautilya begins his Arthasastra with his salutations to Sukra and Brihaspati who had been his immediate predecessors in office, during the uprooted regime of the Nandas. His is a clear allegiance to both Dravidian and Aryan principles in the blended culture of the Hindus. In politics it means absolute equality and in law complete uniformity, whatever may be the distinction and diversity in the matter of particular traditions and rituals and other religious observances, among various schools of Vedic thought. In this connection it is interesting to note that the devolution of Stridhanam property was also proceeding on the line of approved or unapproved forms of marriage as they were prevalent in higher or lower castes among Hindus. And Kautilya defined Stridhanam as property endowed on a woman to support her in all cases of calamity befalling her. What was originally a bride-price or Sulka came to be endowed on the bride as affectionate gift and lastly as one in view to avert her wretchedness in case of an unforeseen calamity or contingency. The approved forms partook of Brahmin or Aryan tradition and the others of Dravidian one. And to-day we are so advanced, rather so far removed from those days that we have come to regard the happy blend itself as the product of Aryan as distinguished from Dravidian culture. And the rich product of steady, though rapid, evolution has now equally come to be regarded as the very Commandment of the Avatar of Vishnu to this day. Not the Vedas only, but the Smritis as well, have with us become equally eternal and of divine origin, which we are asked not to violate or forbidden to transgress at our peril.

CONVERSION.*

The problems of conversion cannot be dealt with either as a "spiritual change" or as a "change of community" without the principle itself being considered and understood, as otherwise, we shall be merely begging the question. The meaning of the term conversion itself has been used in the preceding discussion in many senses. Similarly also the words "Religion and God." According to our individual conceptions of God and the functions of a religion, the purpose of conversion also will differ. I am afraid, it will be beyond me to attempt a metaphysical discussion. I can only put forward my own personal understanding of the situation in the light of the teachings of Jesus as have been recorded by various Gospel writers. We have to bear in mind that even here we are dependent on the frail media of unsophisticated disciples of Jesus. In the preceding discussions we have been using the word Religion in two senses with reference to both Christianity and Hinduism. In the ancient world religion played the part of a code of laws, regulating people's daily conduct and mode of life. In this sense Judaism and Hinduism are religions while Christianity cannot be brought under such a category. You will remember with what meticulous care the ceremonials are described in the Pentateuch and in the Hindu scriptures. In this sense Christianity is not a religion. So while a person may be a good Hindu he may yet owe allegiance to Jesus. Therefore, as long as there is nothing repugnant in one religion to the tenets of another there is no cause for conversion.

In the conception of God we have to remember that many attributes are merely carry-overs from the early days of Judaism. The tribal God of the Jews who visited the iniquity of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation and showed mercy unto thousands of them that love him still persists amongst the Christians—so called. God exists to revenge and to reward. This God has to be propitiated by extending his domain by getting adherents. Herein is the reason for conversion. For every addition to the flock we get a gem in our Crown in heaven. This God in his turn looks after the welfare of his people on earth and fights their battles. The Western nations have four forms of arms—defensive and offensive—the army, the navy, the air force and the Church. So conversion is recruiting in the service of God, King and Country. Missionaries, I know, will stoutly deny this as their main function but they are, nevertheless, conscious or unconscious recruiting agents for gun-fodder. At times of conflict every pulpit is converted into a recruiting platform and the churches on either sides vie with each other to gain all they can in the Imperialistic struggle. I am reminded at this moment of the valuable services rendered by the Bishop of London who went about the front during the World War preaching that the boys who died fighting will go straight to heaven. In his speech Seth Jamnalalji pointed out that the missionaries emphasise the fact that Hinduism holds about 60-million Harijans as slaves as an excuse for their mission of conversion while they ignore the injustice of subjecting 350 millions to bondage. In reply the British missionary friend who spoke before me stated that they themselves are subject to the same Government. Yes, it is true. We are slaves in that our political and economic liberty is curbed under fortuitous circumstances but the missionaries are greater slaves than we in that they have willingly sold their conscience to the Government. What shall it profit a man if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul? Their shackles are heavier than ours. Let us pity them. How can we expect these slaves to help us to attain freedom and justice? Nobody can lift himself with his own boot strings. I did not intend to speak on this aspect but since the point has been raised I cannot ignore the question. During the Satyagraha movement when all kinds of atrocities were inflicted on the Satyagrahis the missionaries stood at a safe distance or within the precincts of the churches and prayed to their God for peace. This is a cowardly and futile attitude. This is not the stuff of which even the church was built up in the early days. When there is no trouble they issue forth from their hiding place and preach and attempt to convert people to cowardice. The History of the Church teaches us that she has been the handmaiden of the State through the ages. Therefore any increase in number of the adherents strengthens the State. In this way the missionaries are playing a dangerous political game in conversion.

These are all perversions of Jesus' teaching giving rise to monstrosities in the religious sphere. Let us for a moment turn to the idea of Jesus on the subject. According to the records we do not find that Jesus advocated any particular form of religion. He himself was not a Christian and we do not see anywhere that he advocated a change of religion as a result of spiritual transformation. True, he said, a man must be born again, but this does not necessitate a change of religion. He did not recognise a tribal God nor is it sure if he even recognised any set form of religion. He has given us certain units of measure. The yard stick of allegiance is "He that is not against us is for us" and not the fact of belonging to any particular religion. (Here a missionary member said it is also stated "He that is not with me is against me." Mr. Kumarappa replied that he is prepared to give Jesus the benefit of the difference in the two statements and accept the broader view as it fits in better with the spirit of Jesus.) "Ye shall know them by their fruits" is his criterion of conduct and not the ceremonial adherence to baptism etc. His mission was "Heal the sick, cleanse the lepers, raise the dead and cast out devils." All forms of social service is all that a follower can render. The test of those who belonged to his family or community is "whosoever shall do the will of my Father which is in heaven, the same is my brother, sister and mother" irrespective of what community or religion a person may belong to. The form of worship he advocated was not the number of times one had to participate in certain rituals but to "let your light so shine before men: that they may see your good works and glorify your father in heaven." Where is there room for conversion as practised by missionaries? When Saul was converted into Paul he did not change his religion. He changed from a fanatic persecutor into one "who was not against us," one who yielded good fruits, who went about serving the needy, and he rejoiced in doing the will of the Father and lighted those in darkness. This much for his teachings and now let us see what Jesus said directly in regard to conversion, "Woe unto you, Scribes and Pharisees, Hypocrites, for ye compass sea and land to make one proselyte and when he is made, you make him twofold more the child of hell than yourselves." (A Missionary lady member interrupted with "Judge not lest ye should be judged" and Mr. Kumarappa said "Madam, direct your quotation to Jesus as these are not my words but his.")

We see Jesus' idea of love of God when he says "Simon lovest thou me, feed my lambs," God is not in need of those who honour Him with the lips saying "Lord, Lord," but those who do the will of the Father in Heaven will be invited to inherit the Kingdom. "For I was thirsty, ye gave me drink, I was a stranger and you took me, naked and ye clothed me, I was in prison and you came unto me." So the only conversion that can take place is not in the religion we adhere to but in our attitude to our fellowmen. On the day of reckoning God will not ask of us our rank, allegiance or birth but just what had we done on earth, in as much as ye had done it unto the least of these my brethren ye had done it unto me. There is neither Greek nor Jew, circumcision or uncircumcision, Barbarian, Scythian, Bond or Free, neither Hindu, nor Muslim, neither Zoroastrian, nor Christian. It is our ideals that matter. If we want to convert a person it can be only to a field of service and not to any man-made fold. Each man is individually responsible to His Maker. Conversion as practised by the missionaries has no support from Jesus, as far as I can see and it is only a mode of increasing the adherents of an institutional religion called Christianity of which Jesus was neither the founder nor a member.

Campaign for a Higher Birthrate:—A big drive for a higher birthrate is to be made in Britain and propaganda in favour of bigger families is to be undertaken both from the view-point of ensuring the national safety and maintaining the race and of securing greater domestic happiness. The organisation concerned with this new campaign is the League of National Life, with Lord Eustace Percy as one of its leaders.

MRS. SANGER AND BIRTH CONTROL

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

My attention has been called to an editorial, "The Case for Birth Control" which appeared in your issue of December 21.

In this editorial the writer accuses me of not stating "the evils of propaganda among people who are not yet ready for it." This is not the case at all. The evils referred to are those resulting from the exploitation of contraceptive devices. This is the case in question and the point referred to in the article by Miss Elizabeth Garrett.

If the writer had looked into the case before accusing me of discourtesy, he would have found that in every address I have given before medical groups since my arrival in India I have urged the physicians to profit by the mistakes we made in the United States and to take hold of the Birth Control movement and direct it themselves. I have pointed out that our archaic laws have prevented the medical profession from leading the movement in the United States and that consequently articles and devices came upon the market from manufacturers like mushrooms over night. Some of these articles were entirely worthless.

I have brought with me three reels of films made specially for the medical profession which give the technique of contraception as it is known in the Western countries. I have stated repeatedly to all groups that if the diaphragm or cervical caps are to be used they must be fitted and advised by a qualified person, a doctor, nurse, or midwife. But, Mr. Editor, this does not mean that there are not other methods of contraception which do not necessarily need a doctor.

The French people have practised birth control for generations and used simple methods fairly successfully, as can be seen from their birth rate, without advice of the family physician at all. It is only when certain methods are used that the doctor's knowledge of physiology and anatomy is essential.

Again may I say that before there was a birth-control movement in the United States there were harmful methods and devices under other names advertised to the public.

In India I have found shops where articles are being sold and have been sold for years which are neither safe nor reliable. It is as necessary to educate the chemist as it is to educate the doctor.

I do not care to discuss other aspects of the editorial which are statements not based on facts or evidence but have confined myself to the points about myself.

I would also like to point out that in every city I have visited I have addressed a group of doctors. I have lectured to nine medical meetings since my arrival in India.

Trivandrum,

Yours, etc.,

28th December, 1935,

MARGARET SANGER.

We gladly publish this first public warning against contraceptive exploitation which Mrs. Sanger has given in this country. It is no use telling 'medical groups' alone of the danger of the traffic in these articles when already the markets are flooded with them. The American Birth Control Conference, according to Miss Garrett, decided to warn the public of the United States against "the increasing flood of contraceptive products, ranging from good to very bad in quality but for the most part quite inferior which are being openly sold all over the the country, in drug stores, by peddlers and by mail." (Reformer, February 17, 1934.) Mrs. Sanger's public meetings here have been more remarkable for her quick repartees than for any warnings. A typical incident was her answer to a Delhi questioner on the moral effect of Birth Control practice, that she had suffered in no way morally after twenty-five years of it. Mrs. Sanger's airy dismissal of 'statements not based on facts' in the editorial is of a similar nature. Her quiet appropriation on behalf of birth control of the credit or blame for the falling French birthrate cannot bear scrutiny. We welcome her assurance that she has admonished medical groups nine times in India to lead in the birth control movement but in the existing circumstances her work will only result in handing over the doctor to the hands of the manufacturer and trader who are today in joint possession of the field. There must be a retreat as well as going forward in the control movement. It has to be rescued from the businessman. Why does Mrs. Sanger evade this issue in India? Her remark that the trade in birth control devices existed before the Birth Control movement is disingenuous. Wrote Miss Garrett, "Mrs. Sanger made the nation birth-control conscious. In doing so she prepared the ground for the commercial exploitation that was to come," Mrs. Sanger, like most eminent fighters in any cause, was a victim of her many admirers in this country. These were eager to show her their devotion, ignorant of her need for advice on India's special conditions.

ALL INDIA WOMEN'S CONFERENCE.

TRAVANCORE MAHARANI'S PRESIDENTIAL ADDRESS

The Tenth Session of the All India Women's Conference was opened on the 28th December at the New Theatre, Trivandrum. About 200 delegates who had come from all parts of India, attended.

Her Highness Sethu Parvati Bai, mother of the Maharaja of Travancore, was elected president. The Maharani said:

The immediate object of this Conference is to create a wider scope for the powers and responsibilities of Indian women and to emphasise the value of women's work in every well-ordered State. The methods of this Conference lie in persuading and justifying; the goal of this Conference must be to create absolute equality of opportunities and position as between the two sexes in all branches of activity. With this feeling and convinced as I am of the importance of this gathering, I approach my task as President of this year's session of the All-India Women's Conference with mixed feelings. The first, in which, I am sure, you will all share, is regret for the unavoidable absence of the original President-Designate—Her Highness the Yuvarani of Mysore, whose absence we all feel very keenly, and not the less because she represents a State and a Royal House which have been amongst the pioneers of women's education and uplift in our country. I am also acutely conscious of the magnitude of my task and its heavy responsibility. At the same time, I am very thankful to those who have, by inviting me to preside on this occasion, signalled their confidence in me—a confidence which I am sure is much less a personal tribute than a symbol of the recognition on your part of the position achieved and maintained by women in this land. This is the first Conference held in an Indian State and it cannot be denied that it is among States that the biggest efforts have been made to remove some of the social and legal disabilities of women.

The country of Kerala, of which Travancore is an important unit, has earned from our brothers across the ghauts the name of "Penmalayalam" or "Women's Malayalam." The appellation is not a conventional compliment. Our laws and social customs based on the matriarchal system followed by us for millennia have given to women a conspicuous place in our polity. The woman is here recognised as the head of the family, and succession is traced through her. No restrictions on the holding and disposition of property and no inequalities regarding education, social life and cultural growth have hampered our sex. Not only has our history afforded instances of queens who have stamped their individuality on the chronicles of their country, but in the fine arts and philosophy, women have played a notable part. The equality of women with men in the matters of political as well as property rights is today an established fact. Co-education in primary institutions and in the higher classes and forms in many schools and colleges is a feature of Travancore, and girls and women have so fully taken advantage of the educational facilities that it has been found possible without interfering with the number of admission to levy full rates of fees from girl students in colleges and three-fourths in schools. There is practically one literate woman to every two literate males and women are now applying freely for admission to various services and other avenues of employment. They are also alive to their wider civic responsibilities as is shown by the circumstance that in co-operative societies, the number of women members is 28,000, a not inconsiderable proportion of the total strength. We are thus, in the main, unaffected by many problems which engross the attention of thoughtful and patriotic persons in other parts of India. We have abolished Devadasi service in our temples and such problems as the purdah, the conditions which have led to the passing of the Sarda Act and to the laws relating to the traffic in women, are not present among us. It is therefore not perhaps inappropriate that a conference designed to co-ordinate the activities of women in various departments and to review and consolidate their status and position should hold its sitting in Travancore. With the utmost pleasure I welcome in our midst representatives from all parts of India and many well-known friends from abroad. Hospitality has been accounted the prominent trait of this country and I am proud to say that not only in the material sphere but in the realm of ideas, we have given and received freely. It is my hope and trust that on this occasion we shall be equal to our reputation and that you will retain pleasant memories of your sojourn amongst us.

It is a matter for profound gratification that the history of women's movement in India, at least in its political aspect, has been one of unhindered progress and has not been marked by those violent struggles which were the precursors of reform elsewhere. The Joint Parliamentary Committee in 1917 felt very nervous of interfering with what was conceived to be the invincible prejudice against the political enfranchisement of women and they left the question to the elected Legislatures of each Province to be settled by their own resolution according to the wishes of the people concerned. Owing to the devoted and strenuous labours of a number of eminent women some of whom I see before me and thanks also to the innate chivalry of our countrymen, which we must ungrudgingly recognise, practically every Province removed all political restrictions on account of sex; and even before England took the step in 1918 and 1919 of equalising the sexes in politics and in various professions, the battle had been won in India. Further, the admission of women into the legal and other professions was never attended with any difficulty here. To say this is, however, not to underestimate the magnitude and complexity of the work ahead of us. In practically every part of India except to some extent in Malabar, women still suffer under marked disabilities as to the holding and the disposal of property. Even though some of the old Lawgivers were fairly liberal as to the position of Hindu women and in Bengal and Bombay their rights were safeguarded up to a point, later authorities and the growth of custom have seriously curtailed their rights. Old doctrines which originated in unsettled and warlike or nomadic times have persisted to the detriment of the peace of many families. It is interesting to remember that until quite recently in England it was impossible for a woman to hold property in her own right or to recover money from her debtor or even to buy things for household use except as the implied agent of the husband. Fortunately these legal anomalies have found a place in the dust-heap of ideas. In India the right to inherit irrespective of sex and according to the nearness of natural relationship and the right of unfettered enjoyment and alienation of property have still to be recognised and the idea that a woman is only a trustee for distant kinsmen or unborn children must become obsolete. Fortunately, in Malabar, we did not suffer from the medieval heresy that the woman was the source of all evil nor did we succumb to the doctrine lately resuscitated in Germany and Italy that her main or sole function was to be a mother. With regard to marriage, amongst most of the communities in this part of India, equality, freedom of choice and adult marriage have been taken for granted, although quite recently there has arisen a curious tendency to adopt disabilities that are prevalent elsewhere. It is obvious that in the Vedic times, marriage was taken to be a voluntary sharing of a common life. The fear of what was called Varnasankara or the confusion of races, a fear which even now has re-asserted itself violently in such widely differing countries as Germany, South Africa and the United States was responsible for many changes in this system including child marriage, the purdah system and the perpetual tutelage of women. Notwithstanding the efforts of pioneers like Pandit Isvar Chander Vidyasagar, the prejudices of ages are dying very slowly and much work is necessary before a wise reconciliation of the old and new ideas takes place. Closely connected with the topic of marriage is that of child widowhood. It must be admitted that, quite irrespective of the fundamental question of eugenics and without trespassing into the region of religion or revelation, there must be something radically wrong in a system which permits of child widows to the appalling extent of seven for every 10,000 between the ages of 1 and 5, and 45 for every 10,000 between the ages of 5 and 10. No scriptures can have sanctioned or encouraged such a state of things and one of the welcome signs of the times is that enlightened opinion both amongst Hindus and Muhammadans is declaring itself forcibly in favour of later marriages and of re-marriage of widows, especially of child widows. It is observable that though under the Muhammadan law the proprietary and marital relations of women are to some extent safeguarded, yet the seclusion of women has led to serious difficulties, which have to be surmounted and overcome. Indeed, in many regions, the strictness of purdah is regarded as proportionate to the status of the family and much patient work is needed to eradicate such ideas.

This Conference which started nine years ago has now become the foremost representative body of the women of India and it has contributed in no small measure to the awakening which has surpassed the expectations of its founders. It has helped to arouse the social conscience in many matters relating to women and their advancement. One of its first items of business was to voice dissatisfaction with the present educational system and it was instrumental in starting the Education Fund, the proceeds of which have been utilised amongst other things, for establishing and maintaining the Lady Irwin College in Delhi, for home science, the training of teachers and psychological research. The Conference played an important part in the establishment of the claim of women to the franchise in British India. It has worked for the adequate education of future mothers, for medical inspection in schools and factories and for the removal of many social and legal disabilities. A glance at the summary of the important resolutions passed in previous sessions would prove that a well-considered programme of rural reconstruction and educational and civic training has been emphasised, and that the Conference has set before itself the important task of rousing public opinion so as to enable all concerned to realise the mistake of segregation of women and of allowing immature girls to become wives and mothers. A great deal has been done though much has yet to be achieved in the matter of the amelioration of the lot of women labourers and the propagation of public health programmes, in which women are vitally interested.

In common with women elsewhere, Indian women have been stirred by a new thought and a new life and the ideal of self-reliance has been fast evolving amongst them, and it is a matter for sincere gratification that practically all the women's organisations in the country have taken a unanimous stand against communal and provincial differences and distinctions in the matter of the franchise and that this has been done at a time when such divergences are tending to be accentuated amongst men. In truth, it may be asserted that one of the biggest successes of the conference lies in the promotion of the ideal of unity of Indian women, and we can well claim that we have successfully fought against the communal and provincial outlook, which has been a disquieting feature of public life in India. The attitude of the women's associations and the resolutions passed by them cannot but strengthen the hands of those who seek to attain a complete understanding and co-operation amongst the many races and communities of India. Our work lies mainly in the direction of the formation of public opinion.

The great upheaval produced by the late war revolutionised thought and made Europe and America realise the value of women's contribution to the national cause. Work had to be done and women had to do it and the principle of equal pay for equal work was soon recognised and the legend of the comparative ineffectiveness and the innate timidity of women was undermined. The coolness and discipline of women in every branch of activity obtained their reward, so that one of the great opponents of the cause, Mr. Asquith speaking about Edith Cavell, declared in October 1915, "There are thousands of such women, but a year ago, we did not know it." By 1918, the political disabilities of women were removed in England and in 1919, their rights to hold public and professional positions pertaining to civil life came to be recognised. It is remarkable that as soon as these steps were taken, the Parliamentary atmosphere completely changed. Measures for which women's societies had been working unsuccessfully for years, such as the Nurses' Registration Bill and an amended Midwives' Bill were taken up as Government measures and passed through all their stages without difficulty. Women began to sit in Parliament and to occupy various responsible positions and in 1920 the Report of the Lambeth Conference stated the belief of the Conference that the Anglican church would be strengthened by making freer use of the spiritual gifts of women. It took 70 years of ceaseless propaganda for America to amend its constitution by providing that the rights of the citizens of the United States shall not be denied or abridged on account of sex. It would, however, be correct to say that this great development for which groups of women had worked in many countries took place mainly because of national crises on the issue of which the fates of nations depended. But it will be remembered that as soon as the women's claims were recognised, it was found that they were justified. Women very soon attained the highest learned and academical distinctions. The Presidentship of the Botanical section of the British Association was awarded to a woman in 1918. In 1920, the gold medal of the Royal Geographical Society was bestowed upon a woman. The Parliamentary work of woman has been recognised to be of indubitable value. Women during the war and thereafter held responsible posts in the civil service of various countries. In the United States, there are 6,000 women physicians and 1,600 practising lawyers and amongst them assistant attorneys-general, provincial and central. 300 American cities employ police women in duties relating to the welfare of women and children and they do probation work and the supervision of dance halls and places of entertainment and work in connection with the juvenile courts. In journalism and banking, they have played an important part. It was not many weeks ago that the award of the Nobel Prize to Madame Joliot, the worthy daughter of a celebrated mother Madame Curie, demonstrated the capacities of women in the domain of recondite science.

In spite of all these advances, it still remains true that even in the West there are many directions in which women's progress is still limited. Fundamentally, the problem is not political or even social—it is economic. In the last resort, the solution of women's problems depends on securing for them, in marriage and out of it, economic independence. Freedom to work outside the home is one of the ideals which cannot be kept outside the range of discussion and decision, as well as the recognition of her claims to economic partnership in the home. Thus, although the legal emancipation of women may have taken place in many countries, the full recognition and the securing of the individual position of women in domestic relationship are yet insecure because of the survival of the old doctrine of tutelage. It is a commonplace that woman's cause is man's and that men and women sink or swim together, but experience has taught us that self-help and organisation are the only methods to secure success as distinguished from mere reliance on generosity or patronage; and this Conference exists for implementing such methods. This is its legitimate function and its raison d'être. The clouds are lifting and the dawn is breaking; may it be given to us to see the sunrise!

Birth Control:—She felt strongly that the medical men were the proper persons to disseminate knowledge of scientific birth control methods to the people. One of the great dangers that beset the movement was the spread of wrong ideas about the methods to be adopted. Therefore, she felt that the medical profession ought to take charge of the movement. The medical profession in India ought to lead the movement. A good deal of infantile and maternity mortality could be reduced through a proper application of scientific birth control methods.—Mrs. Sanger at Madras.

WOMEN'S RIGHTS AND RELIGION.

A most disquieting feature of our religions has been their almost persistent refusal to allow the emancipation and advancement of women through all centuries. I do not speak of religion in the West. My observations are concerned only with the inconsistent, intolerable maxims of the main religions of India today which command a large number of followers. My idea of a religion which does not allow a certain amount of freedom to its faithful allies is very poor; again a religion which does not look upon all sections of the populace as having equal rights and responsibilities does not appeal to me in the least. In this, I hope to have a large number of comrades, especially of the youthful blood. If one party is always under the heels of another, there is always bound to be friction, discontent and hence weakness of the whole. This was what has been evident in India from the first.

It is because women have remained hitherto weak physically, that we have conquered them and subjected them to the most cruel treatment. Henceforth this position as lord and slave is impossible. They are revolting more and more. As civilization advances, as more liberal ideas spread among the people, and as a spirit of tolerance arises, we have to confine our activities to our own sphere and leave women to think freely, act freely and judge freely. All this one must take into account before he tries to assert himself over woman. The husband will have less power to awe his wife, command her and use her as a tool for his own pleasures. He has to learn—it may be a bitter lesson—that she is his free companion and cannot be coerced. The father will have to give the same rights to his daughter as to his son and understand that she cannot be removed from the list of succession. He may have to consult her in family affairs. The brother will recognise in her a possible co-sharer to his father's property and would do well to regard her as he would do his brother. The friend will see that in woman he recognises an equal and not an object to be bullied. All this may come about very soon.

Therefore my advice to man is not to treat woman as he has been doing, but to conceive her as a creature created as his equal. We in India, have to learn this grim truth all the more early, for we have been their evil geni for too long a time. Indian women may be much harder on men than the women of all other nations for they have reasons to be so.

We shall do well to review what we have done, and be more careful in the future. Why did we not allow them their place in the sun? Why should we put barriers that we do not raise in man's way? The curious problem that faces us today is why should we after all our enlightenment, think that they are inferior to us?

Much controversy has arisen about the question of widow remarriage and various shades of opinion have been expressed on several occasions by a large number of prominent people. I will not go here into the details of all these but would like to refer to one or two outstanding inequalities. Sanathanists and religious leaders have said that Hindu Sasthras do not permit widow re-marriage but at the same time admit that they give freedom to a man to marry as many wives as many times as he likes. Is not this most incongruous and inconsistent? Does it not show a falsity and hollowness in our religious ideas and ideals? It will be enough to say that such a regulation has been imposed because of man's distrust of woman. Chastity has been represented as a virtue peculiarly applicable to the fairer sex alone and not to man. Polygamy was, in the case of kings especially, regarded as quite within the bounds of law, and was sometimes even claimed as a virtue. If polygamy was authorized and practised why should polyandry be disallowed? If rules of social conduct are so partial and hence inapplicable to all people, should they not be expunged and new ones framed? Let those who oppose widow remarriage in principle or detail consider this first.

The Hindu Widow Remarriage Act was passed in 1856 and the first recorded instance of a widow being remarried took place in Calcutta in the same year. The next year was one of Mutiny and created a large number of widows. Since then though nearly eighty years have passed, it is disconcerting to find that widow remarriage has not found favour with large sections of the people. Simply because religion proved the most formidable obstacle. Even now there are a large number of young widows who would like to get married but who find it impossible. With child marriages not yet put down even in educated classes and having upwards of 23,000 widows below the age of five at present in the Hindu community, little children who do not yet know their fate, what would be the future of the community?

I would like here to refer to certain heinous customs prevailing among caste Hindus. Among the Brahmins mainly the custom of completely cutting of the hair of a widowed woman, depriving her of all her ornaments, not allowing her to use flowers and kum-kumam and giving a piece of white cloth for wear is very strong. She is made unfit to live in this world; she is made the ugliest creature on the face of the earth and is usually regarded as an ill omen. She is outcaste from society. Why there should be this cruelty to the poor victims it is impossible to understand. It is one of those many barbarous customs among the community that have brought about its social downfall. No one need be under the illusion that this custom is disappearing with education. It is not. In cities a few young women may escape this fatality but in most parts it is enforced with a fervour and rigour a parallel to which could be found only in the case of Suttee. Women's organisations should take particular note of this and must strive hard to put it out of practice.

One other aspect of the disabilities of women in India, I would like to point out. Under the Laws of Manu and its subsequent modifications a woman has no right to property. When she is a daughter she depends upon her father; in the married state upon the husband and if she becomes a widow upon her son if she has any or if she is childless upon her relations. Thus women in India have no economic independence. Her economic jaildom is the main contributory cause of her untold sufferings. If man is the real holder of justice, as he poses himself to be, it is but right that he should admit woman as a partner to property rights. It is imperative that law should admit woman's rights and all legal disabilities in the way of her inheriting property must be put aside. Instead of bringing about ineffective Bills, why not members introduce a bill for giving women the right of inheritance? They will be doing much good work if they do this and pass it into an Act.

Woman has shown her mettle in India; she has proved that she is worthy of adoration, of sacrifice and of the noblest qualities that spring from the heart of man; she has convinced men beyond a shadow of doubt that she has no superior or equal in her own peculiar departments; then why delay her rightful position in life? Only if the heterogeneous mass of fantastic, incongruous, fetishes and chimerical ideals that hold sway over us be eliminated at the earliest possible opportunity can there be social peace and well-being in our land, and then only can we hope to lead the nations of the world in spiritual progress.

Madras.

V. VENKATACHALAM.

SIR S. RADHAKRISHNAN ON HINDUISM.*

Hinduism is an organic growth spread over, according to the views of accepted chronologists, forty or fifty centuries. We will not be able to understand it by either looking at its origin or by taking a cross section at any one stage of its history or of any sequence of events. It is the expression of an idea struggling to be born and endeavouring to embody itself in historic institutions. At no stage has the idea been perfectly expressed, though at every stage, there is the struggle for expression. We can have only a vague feeling and we can never see it expressed in one perfect embodiment. If one wants to know what in essence Hinduism is, one must understand the general principles underlying it, the inspiring motives and the general philosophic conceptions which have governed the whole career of Hinduism.

The answer to the question as to what constitutes Hinduism has been given times out of number. Hinduism does not believe that religion is either the acceptance of one creed or another, or the practice of particular rituals; but it believes that it is a kind of experience to raise our lives to a very different kind of temper. It is an experience and not an obedience to a dogma, the raising of our life into a higher plane. Religion is rebirth; it is not an addition to the intellectual furniture. It is the transformation of the whole of our being; it is not a question of our awakening from a swoon but it is a new vision, a change-over and an overhauling of our whole life. Religious education can be broadly distinguished into instruction and training. Instruction points to new ideas; training enables us to develop habits. Instruction tells us what truth is; training enables us to embody that truth in our lives. Therefore religion can best be defined as the organic realisation of the highest truth.

Religious growth is not a mechanical evolution and we can find three ascending levels in the instruction. The first two, Shravana and Manana, are those where we acquire the truth and the third Nidhidhyasana is where we will be able to incorporate, assimilate and make it the substance of life. There are many who think that religion means the learning of the various traditions and making them a matter of routine. But it was enjoined upon educated people to find out whether those truths are capable of being sustained by reason and whether it is possible for us to test them by reason and prove their validity. The scriptures contain not only the products of ripest wisdom, but also wayward fancies, and there are so many things which will not stand the test of reason. We must apply discrimination and logic and try to distinguish the tenable from the untenable. This is the most important task.

If we take up the universal prayer, the Gayathri, we find that it gives something real. The Gayathri is a prayer for a passionate renewal of our own lives; it is a search; it is a quest and an adventure. There is no finality so far as religious life and quest are concerned. The term 'philosopher' means not the teacher of truth, but the seeker of truth. It is only searching within oneself for guidance. It is not to be done in congregations. It is to be done in silence by each individual in and by himself. There is a saying in the Book of Revelation that when the Angels went before God, there was a silence for half an hour. If that silence is necessary for angels, it is all the more necessary for human beings. The point is that one must have complete honesty and utter sincerity. Meditation is but communion with one's own inner self, and it is there that we may see the connecting links between the soul and the Universal Self. The Gayathri wants us to keep up that perpetual search. One man cannot be asked to express the experience of another so long as the other has an individuality of his own. It is not possible for us to give an exhaustive definition of a common ordinary individual in terms of adjectives and universals and much more so will it be difficult to define Reality in such a way.

Therefore, the wisest thinkers have adopted a tone of reticence in defining the Supreme Reality. They have stated that it is something which a man has to discover for himself. Austerity of silence is the only way in which we can establish this great Reality. It is because of this that some have tried to define reality in negative characteristics. 'Pure being is pure nothing' is a criticism levelled against this method of defining reality. The Upanishads state "That which is void of all predicates, that fundamental reality, that non-dual thing, to the feeble-minded, appears as non-existent." But it may be asked whether in the medley of things there is a method of understanding the Absolute. If we study the various interpretations and meanings given in the scriptures, with patience and with some penetration, we may be able to understand that there is one common synthetic point of view which co-ordinates all these varied descriptions.

The point is that in each man's heart is written his pathway to God. The work of the teacher is merely to assist its natural growth, its unconscious growth, because the forces of the Universe are co-operating with it, and the innermost depths of the man are thirsting for manifestation. What the teacher has to do is to provide the environment which is capable of furthering its growth or life. Religious conversion does not consist in substituting one doctrine for another. It consists in deepening one's life and enabling one to pursue truth on one's own lines. God knows our deficiencies and defects. We may not know God, but it is wrong on our part to think that God does not know us. He is judging the sincerity of our pursuits and the honesty of our endeavours and, in time, will try to correct the deficiencies which we have and bring about a better conception of God Himself. Conversion is spiritual rebirth and it is not a mental substitution. It is possible for everyone of us to get that rebirth and every Hindu believes that Gayathri enables him to bring about that kind of rebirth, which is coeval with human history. That is what the Hindu religion states so far as conversion is concerned. We have been catholic and universal in our outlook. Are we going to define our religion by an unchanging creed or are we going to determine its nature by emphasising this universal quest in which all people could unite? Personally, speaking for myself, I believe the forces of the world are with us and the time-spirit is with us, and I have no doubt that the true conception of religion which insists on this quest more than on any creed, which enables us to join together in the pursuit of those common ideals—that is the thing which has a future still, because it is the truth and that is bound to win and bound to live.

BAPTISM AND CHRISTIANITY.

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

If, as you say in the Reformer dated December 28 "the true test of belief is behaviour," the founders of all the religions will be ashamed of their followers. I have never known a sect or community of people more obedient to God's will than the Quakers or Society of Friends who have no sacraments, including Baptism. The Catholic (Latin and Romo-Syrian), the Church of England and the Jacobite (Malabar Syrian) Churches are the only three, out of more than a hundred Christian sects, for whose members Baptism is essential.

The Catholic Church, however, venerates at least one great saint, St. Sebastian, who was never baptised. He suffered martyrdom under one of the Roman Emperors (I think Vespasian) before he could be baptised. His supposed or proved desire for Baptism and the fact of his martyrdom entitled him to be canonised as a saint.

The Church of England, the official religion of England and of the British rulers of India, cannot, strictly speaking, insist on Baptism as preliminary to membership of that Church. Here is my reason for it:

In 1850 a clergyman named G. C. Gorham was presented by the Lord Chancellor to the living of Bramford Speke in North Devon, in the jurisdiction of Bishop Phillips of Exeter. The Bishop refused to appoint Mr. Gorham on the ground that Mr. Gorham did not believe in Baptismal Regeneration. Mr. Gorham appealed to the Archbishop of Canterbury against the Bishop of Exeter whose decision was upheld by the Archbishop. Mr. Gorham then took his case to Parliament which quashed both the previous decisions. This was the immediate cause of the two Archdeacons, Henry Edward Manning (better known as Cardinal Manning) and Robert Wilberforce, leaving the Church of England and joining the Catholic Church.

At the same time, I wonder why Baptism is objected to by those who would follow the teachings of our Lord. The Syrian Christians of Travancore, Cochin and Malabar, who are the descendants of High caste Hindus, including Nambudri Brahmins, are strong upholders of Baptism. In spite of their having been Christians for nineteen hundred years, their acharyams at birth, marriage and death and the manner of their daily lives are almost exactly similar to those of their Hindu ancestors. If Baptism as a token of the honour of following Jesus Christ is considered unnecessary, the Sudhi ceremony for those Christians and Mohammedans who return to Hinduism has no meaning; the Upanayanam as the first important step to Brahmanism becomes valueless; the Mangala Sootram at the marriage of Hindus and the orthodox Christians of Malabar may be dispensed with. Tomorrow's newspapers will publish the usual list of honours for the friends and admirers of the Government, but the outward tokens of those honours are expected to be conferred upon the recipients by medals and badges, without which the inward kindly appreciation of the Government will merit little public recognition. Jesus Christ submitted to all the usages of His time, and was baptised, though He said "Rent your heart and not your garment."

Few things could do greater harm to Christianity than these mass conversions in India. Some months ago a Christian excitedly complained that an important Hindu had claimed to be able to reconvert to Hinduism all the mass conversion Christians of a certain district, if he had one lakh of rupees to distribute among them. My comment was that sixty thousand rupees could easily do it.

To those who are waiting to see Christian conduct in Christians, the following part of his first sermon preached in Bombay on the 17th November 1908, by Dr. Palmer, the former Bishop of Bombay, will be of interest. Referring to the institution of the Blessed Sacrament, the Bishop said: "As the sacred elements passed the lips of the disciples, was the Lord not saying by His Institution, 'My Body now will be lost to men's sight, but remember it will be lost in you. I give myself for you, and to you, and into you. Henceforth if men would find me they must find me in you.' My brethren, it is the most astounding condescension, the most humiliating trust."

VILLAGE UPLIFT—A SUGGESTION.

The Editor,
The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

While Mahatma Gandhi and his co-adjutors are working hard in the cause of uplift of the villagers and popularising village products among cities, and Government are busy with their schemes regarding supply of Midwives etc, a commonplace suggestion will not be amiss. It is well known that the agriculturist is greatly handicapped in a number of ways, and if some practical step be taken to remove any of his difficulties, that step will be in the right direction.

The troubles of the agriculturist start with the first operations. Unfortunately his embarrassed circumstances require the sowcar's help from the start. For the purchase of bullocks and seeds, for the hire of field labourers he must needs have the sowcar's help on the security of the growing crops. In addition to charging a fairly high rate of interest, the sowcar sells seeds at a heavy rate and purchases the crop at cheaper rates. If some arrangement be made to market the village crops, the agriculturist will have a easier time. Our Indian Banks can easily undertake this kind of work. At present there is a plethora of cash. The rates of interest are lowered by the Banks, yet Saving Bank deposits are pouring in. As an experiment one centre may be selected by the Bank. To start with a sum of about one lac of rupees may be made available for this kind of work. It need not be necessary to have all the parapharnellia of a Bank Branch. A responsible man can be easily found in the centre selected who can be trusted with the work. On the ready crop being delivered to the Agent of the Bank 75 or 80 per cent of the current value of the crop may be paid out to the agriculturist and this will prevent the necessity of his selling away the produce at any low price to meet the Land Revenue demands and the dues of his sowcar. The Bank Agent may then sell the goods in his possession at the best prices and realise the loan with interest at a rate not exceeding six per cent; the surplus being available to the cultivator. This may be the first step towards a Central Market. There are a number of public workers who will come forward to co-operate with the Banks starting this experiment. The Bombay Provincial Co-operative Bank or the Bank of India or the Central Bank with its numerous branches ought to be able to take up this business. If this works successfully, the distribution of seeds and manure may then be taken up.

Paranjpye on Religion:—It is distressing to see a man of intellectual eminence and true nobility of character like Dr. Paranjpye inveighing against religion as the great obstacle to human progress. When the youthful fervid orators of Chowpathi Sands declaim against religion, the public understands that they are merely repeating parrotlike the shibboleths of a narrow materialism, and does not take them seriously. But when Dr. Paranjpye seems to endorse such immature outbursts, it rubs its eyes in surprise. Its first impulse is to assume that he has been misreported. When no explanation is forthcoming, it becomes a public duty to point out that his opinion contravenes the plain facts of history. Does any one really think that but for the great religions—Hinduism, Judaism, Christianity, Zoroastrianism, Buddhism, Islam—humanity would have progressed as far as it has in civilization? True, and it is a pity, that humanity is still very much in the stage of barbarism. What has kept it there, however, is not religion but its own inadequate response to the call of religion. Religion has proclaimed through the ages the message of peace and goodwill. There have been great moments in history when men were deeply impressed and tried hard to follow the behests of religion. These moments are milestones marking the onward march of our race. Let us compare the world as it was before Buddha, Jesus, and Mahomed and as it is today. Doubtless there are dark spots which arrest our eyes but that fact itself is proof that we have advanced far beyond the time preceding these great Teachers. Our forefathers of those days took these darkneses as a matter of course. We have developed a social conscience, though as yet we are far from obeying its whispers without question. Even within the last generation or two, which is within the experience of the distinguished Vice-Chancellor of Lucknow University, the public conscience has become wonderfully alive to wrong and injustice inflicted on helpless weakness by arrogant power. The movement for the removal of untouchability in India is itself a striking illustration. Those who know Dr. Paranjpye and the high ideals which he has consistently maintained in his life and conduct, will not be misled by his thinking aloud on religion. But the number of those who enjoy this privilege is far fewer than that of those who do not; and these will not be able to interpret his words, as words should always be interpreted, in the light of the life of the man who uses them. We are not suggesting that Dr. Paranjpye should suppress his thoughts in order that they might not be misunderstood. What we would wish is that, whenever he chooses to talk of religion, he should explain what he understands by that term and whether he would wish his hearers to set at naught its call to service and sacrifice for the common good.

Which has not taught weak wills how much they can,

Which has not fallen on the dry heart like rain,

Which has not cried to sunk, self-weary man,
Thou shouldst be born again?

Reviling Hinduism:—Principal Ambedkar would seem to be employing the intervals between his admirable lectures at the Bombay Law School in inventing increasingly opprobrious epithets to hurl at Hinduism. The latest stigmatises it as a "contagious disease." We have not seen the context in which it was used and have come to learn of it from the friendly remonstrance of the Bombay Chronicle. If it is the learned Doctor's intention to sting Hindus into action of some sort, he is sure to be disappointed. Long experience has inured them to abuse, persecution, oppression. It has taught them that patience under the gravest provocation, is the surest way of overcoming antagonism. On the whole and in the long run the lesson they have thus learnt, has proved its efficacy. Dr. Ambedkar's invectives are met with general sympathy. "It does Hinduism no harm, and, if the good Doctor finds solace in calling it names, let him do it by all means." It is even argued that the very depth of Dr. Ambedkar's bitterness shows his deep attachment to Hinduism, since no one would take the trouble of fulminating against what he does not care for. What people, who are most in sympathy with the cause of the uplift of the antyajās, much regret is that the Doctor who admits that he has no quarrel with social reformers, should fail to see that they are surely growing both in numbers and influence and that the younger generation, in particular, is impatient of the abuse which disfigures Hinduism. Time is on their side; the intellect and conscience of the country and the world at large, is on their side also. Public controversies generally and necessarily keep to conventional grounds. But human conduct is affected by private griefs one of the most poignant of which recently overtook Dr. Ambedkar. In some minds they are sublimated into wide charity: in many, however, they sour the spirit. In the latter case, however, the feeling is seldom permanent.

Social Reform and Temple Entry:—Untouchables are not the only people who are prohibited from entering Hindu temples. Social reformers are subject to the same disability, the only difference being that, while in the former case, the ban is enforced by custom on a whole class, in the latter, it has to be issued by the temple authority in each case. The West Coast Reformer reports that the Zamorin Raja of Calicut has, as trustee of the famous Guruvayur Temple, which was the scene, three years ago, of a determined attempt to break the ban, against untouchables, issued an order forbidding the admission of the senior Raja of Nilambur and several others to the Temple. On the Ekadashi day, writes the journal, the third and fourth Thirumulpads of the Nilambur Kovilham went to worship at the Guruvayur Temple when Mr. Kunhiraman Menon, the manager of the Guruvayur Devaswom, showed them an edict of the Zamorin Raja prohibiting the Senior Raja of Nilambur and the fourth Thirumulpad from entering the temple inasmuch as they took part in a Nambudiri widow marriage at Thrithala. Altogether 42 persons have been brought under the edict for their participation in the marriage festivities. The Senior Raja of Nilambur on being informed of the ban said that personally he did not care for it but for the sake of his family he would file a suit in the Courts to get the order cancelled. The family belongs to the exclusive Nambudiri Brahmin caste which occupies in the social economy in Kerala a status so high as to be almost giddy.

Catholics and Conversion:—Mr. George Joseph, ex-Congressman and Vaikom Satyagrahist, has drawn upon his past intimacy with Congress politics in his presidential address to the Fourth Catholic Congress at Nagpur. Arguing from Khilafat analogy that Hindu Dharma placed on members of that religion the duty of not only permitting others but even assisting them to fulfil their religious duty as conceived by them, Mr. Joseph expressed surprise that Hindus opposed the Christian's religious work of converting Hindus to Christianity. He demanded that even if assistance was not forthcoming there should be 'bare tolerance.' The Hindu who is prepared to be as accommodating as Mr. Joseph desires and even to submit to conversion to lustre to Mr. Joseph's Christian qualities, might well ask himself "Christian conversion but which To this Mr. Joseph points the way to Catholicism as the one true faith. But for practical purposes Mr. Joseph is prepared to make peace in this pagan country with schismatics and heretics. Strictly speaking this should restrict conversion activities to Hindus because, according to Dante, Islam was but a sect of Christianity and even Swedenborg places the Muslims in a special position in the spiritual world on the Christian border just after the outer, Catholic fringe. But Mr. Joseph will be 'vigilantly hostile' even with Islam.

A Demand on Hindu Tolerance:—Mr. Joseph does not explain why the Hindu should be tolerant to organisations which are prepared to display tact, reserve or moderation but no friendliness. It is possibly a tacit admission that he expects better behaviour from Hindus than he is himself capable of. "We have been subjected," wrote Raja Ram Mohan Roy over a hundred years ago of the Hindus, "to insults for nine centuries and the cause of such degradation has been our excess of civilisation." It is reassuring to have confirmation of this statement, even unconsciously, from such a "vigilantly hostile" critic as Mr. Joseph. The President of the Catholic Conference is not evidently familiar with Christian scripture or Indian Christian practice. "The organisation of caste" is not confined to Hindus only. In his own South India Mr. Joseph must have seen caste in the Christian community. "The awful and heart-breaking incapacity of self-defence erected into the doctrine of Ahimsa" is, it is true, far removed from the spirit of the Crusades or of war-mongering bishops of modern Europe. But it is near to the admonition of Jesus, "Whosoever shall smite thee on thy right cheek, turn to him the other also." It was again Jesus and no Hindu who laid down the precept "Resist not evil." The Catholic President uttered the gravest indictment of the religious and social policy of the Government of India. "What the State both in British India and Indian India should have done all on its own, the Mission has done in large measure," said Mr. Joseph immediately after defending conversions for material gain. The speaker left his readers to draw the obvious conclusion that what every citizen can demand as a right from the State, has to be gained in India by apostasy from his ancestral religion.

Hosts and Guests:—In last week's Reformer we felt obliged, in the absence of a contradiction for several days after the publication of the remark, to take exception to the categorical classification of Hindus and other communities as hosts and guests respectively, as bringing undeserved odium on the Hindu Mahasabha which has all along taken the broad nationalistic line of equal opportunities for all. We are glad that His Holiness the Sankaracharya of Kurtakoti, to whom the remark was attributed, has since issued a statement of what he actually said which was as follows:—"India was once of Hindus only, but others who had come here as guests remained to make it their motherland. Having flourished here, it is unbecoming of them to try or even to think of exterminating Hinduism from the land of its birth and being. Living in Hindusthan, they should imbibe the tolerant spirit of the Hindus." The statement is, of course, historically correct but we do not see that anything is gained by recurring now and again to the relative positions of our several communities in the remote past. His Holiness would have noticed that the remark as it was reported gave occasion for some acrimonious comments.

Politicians and Office:—Liberal leaders at the Nagpur Federation and elsewhere have been taking much trouble to show that they are not the office seekers that they are represented by Congressmen to be. They point out that Mr. Venkatrama Sastry, the President of the Federation this year, and Mr. Chintamani resigned office—the one as Member of the Madras Executive Council, the other as Minister for Education in the United Provinces—because of differences on questions of principle or policy. They may also refer to the examples of Sir Sakaran Nair who was President of the Congress in its early years, and to Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru who resigned from the Liberal Party many years after he resigned the Law Membership of the Governor General's Executive Council. On the other side, it is not difficult to mention Liberals who have continued to hold office through thick and thin, as there are Congressmen who hold that obedience to the leaders of the majority for the time being, is the height of patriotism, no matter how irrational or impracticable may be the commands they lay upon the members. It is very much a matter of the individual's sensitiveness of conscience and very little of party affiliation, whether one would, in given circumstances, decide to swim with the current or to stem the flowing tide or merely to stand aside and let it flow past. Mr. Baldwin, who is generally said to be a man of sensitive honour, left his colleague, Sir Samuel Hoare, to bear the brunt of the criticism for the peace proposals which he had framed with the French Prime Minister to end the Ethiopian War.

Bloated Salaries:—Cabinet solidarity with the gold standard and Free Trade, was long regarded as a sheet anchor of British policy, and it, along with them, has gone by the board. Mr. Baldwin, no doubt, was actuated by higher considerations than the preservation of his personal honour which, the leader of the Opposition declared, was directly involved in the collapse of the Hoare-Laval proposals. It is no reproach to politicians to desire office. Without control of the Government, they can not carry out their measures; and they can get control of Government only by occupying Ministers' positions. A section of Congressmen themselves are keen to accept office on this very ground. If it is nothing wrong for them, it can not be wrong for Liberals to do the same. In no other country will the holding of office by a political party be accounted a matter of condemnation. It will not be so considered in India but for the fact that the emoluments of high office here are absurdly exorbitant. The official justification for this extravagance is that it is necessary to prevent corruption. In other words, it is a form of blackmail levied on the country to prevent officials from taking bribes. This doctrine is held to be applicable only to India. One of the first duties of a truly National Government will be to cut down salaries of high offices to reasonable figures in keeping with the economic condition of the people. When this is done, office seeking or holding will cease to be regarded as dishonourable in politicians.

This Democracy:—Reuter's telegram on Monday: "The Ross and Cromarty Conservative Association, against the advice of its headquarters, by 135 to 93 votes, adopted Mr. Randolph Churchill as the official Conservative candidate in opposition to Mr. Malcolm MacDonald. Mr. Churchill, in a slashing attack on both Mr. Ramsay MacDonald and Mr. Malcolm MacDonald, described the suggestion that they represented Labour as a "fraudulent, insincere, hypocritical and downright lie. Reuter on Wednesday:—"Extraordinary scenes were witnessed at Dingwall this evening in connection with the by-election. Pipers played Mr. Malcolm MacDonald from his hotel to the Town Hall, where he delivered a speech. Smilingly alluding to Mr. Churchill, he declared amid tremendous cheering. "When the descendant of the great Duke of Marlborough comes to the Highlands to challenge a descendant of the Clan MacDonald, the MacDonald stands and fights (Cheers. A voice: 'And we will fight with you') and the MacDonald will win." Mr. Malcolm MacDonald received a tremendous ovation when he was leaving." Five hundred and odd persons elected on this kind of flapdoodle constitute the Parliament whose decisions, we are told, carry an authority which it is sacrilegious to question!

Travancore Leads:—Travancore is the most orthodox Hindu State in India and it is the last one would expect to take the lead in ignoring the age-old prejudice against the Depressed classes. It is, therefore with much satisfaction that we note the appointment of Mr. N. Kumaran of the Ezhava community to the Bench of its High Court. He is the first Judge to be appointed to the Travancore High Court from classes treated as backward, and one of the first such High Court Judges to be appointed in India. He took charge of his office this week. He belongs to the Ezhava community, which has no rights of temple entry, and which, for purposes of Government concessions, is treated as a backward community.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

BOMBAY, January 18, 1936.

THE PROBLEM OF LANGUAGES.

Mr. Sachchidananda Sinha prefaced his presidential address to the Conference convened by that body at Allahabad last Sunday, with a short account of the Hindustani Academy. The Academy was established by the Government of the United Provinces eight years ago. The object of the Academy was to bring about a fusion of the two languages of Upper India, Hindi and Urdu, into one language. The principal means by which this object was to be accomplished was the elimination of the Sanskrit element from Hindi and of the Persian and Arabic elements from Urdu. We do not know if and how much of the two languages would be left when this process is completed. Hindi is a direct derivative of Sanskrit and we fancy that the elimination of Sanskrit elements in it will leave it without words to express any but the most primitive needs of human intercourse. Urdu, on the other hand, was in its origin a camp language—a medley—which arose out of the need of having a medium of communication between the Persian Moghuls and their Indian subjects. Urdu was not the official language of Muslim rulers. Hindi was the official language; and it is noteworthy that it was the Hindu Minister of Akbar, Todar Mal, who substituted Persian, obliging the Hindus to become proficient in that language as the principal avenue to employment in the Public Service. If Persian and Arabic elements are dropped out of Urdu, the Sanskrit will remain as the residue. Such are the conclusions suggested by a cursory study of the history of Indian languages without special knowledge of Urdu and Hindi.

The trend of Mr. Sinha's observations seems to be that the ambitious attempt at the unification of Urdu and Hindi, has been attended by the same difficulties as the attempts at Hindu Muslim unity. The two problems, in fact, have become intermingled, so much so that the solution of the one without the other is not easy. "I fear I must state my conviction in unhesitating terms" said Mr. Sinha "that the Academy has not yet been able to pay sufficient attention to it", namely, the evolution of a common form of speech in the United Provinces. The representative Committee appointed some years ago to devise means of carrying out this primary object, has not been able to reach any conclusion. "As if that was not regrettable in all conscience" the President went on to say, "I was surprised to find a prominent member of the Conference writing to the Press, in the face of the declarations I have quoted, that it was not the primary aim and object of this institution to achieve what was so declared to be by its founders and prominent supporters, and that it was idle to think of evolving one common form of speech and writing which might be intelligible to all persons in Upper India." Mr. Sinha did not share that view but the only reason he was able to adduce for his not sharing it, was that without a common vernacular it was almost impossible to impart higher education through the medium of the vernacular in the United Provinces. Even if the Hindustani Academy had succeeded in eight years in evolving a common vernacular from the dregs of Hindi and Urdu, it will be many years before it can be made the vehicle of higher education. Text books will have to be written. Without a considerable literature, languages must consist mostly of colloquialisms and can not become media of culture. Even the Bengali language which Mr. Sinha, with much reason, pointed out as a model, has not become the medium of higher education. The idea of ousting English from its position as the principal medium of higher education, is not, as Mr. N. S. Subba Rao tersely observed in his presidential address to the Kannada Conference a few days ago, practical politics.

The position at present is this: so long as we use the medium of the English language, we stand on neutral ground. When we think of using the vernaculars as our medium, the ghosts of old historic, religious and provincial differences begin to gibber and grimace in our faces. Until we have made sure that these are finally laid, the wise course is to stick to English as the cultural medium. The idea that a single common language is a sine qua non of nationalism is becoming, like the idea of nationalism itself, antiquated. In primitive societies where the most urgent task of the lawgiver was to create some sort of bond to hold together nomad tribes, the use of a single language had to be enforced by severe penalties. Bagehot in his "Physics and Politics" quotes an old English saying, "He who knows two languages is a rascal." The use of a single common language was, in fact, like the prohibition of foreign travel and other restrictions, originally intended to prevent the infection of the native mind by ideas alien to the stamp which the lawgiver wished to impress on his people. We can see instances of this in modern countries which follow a policy of assimilating foreign immigrants. The traditional policy of India, however, has not been assimilation but freedom to each immigrant community to follow its religious and social customs. That they came to speak the local vernaculars in most cases, was due to practical needs and not to political pressure. The assimilation school is no longer sure of its ground. The theory of evolution has permeated sociological and political thought, and the tendency now is to grant cultural freedom, which includes freedom of language, to minorities. The League of Nations has put the seal of its approval on the new tendency by incorporating it in its scheme for the protection of minorities. Even nations which are independent of any restriction on their sovereign power, are beginning to qualify their assimilation policy by instituting special faculties in their Universities, for the encouragement of the study of the languages and cultures of their minorities. On the other side, a common language does not necessarily prevent or avert national differences. This seems particularly to be the case with the English language. There is also the case of the Boers and the Dutch; and of the French and the French Canadians. The fact is, of all barriers to human intercourse language is the one which is most easily overcome.

The obstacles to Indian unity are not those created by differences of language, or religion nor yet by geographical conditions. The only obstacle, and it is a very great one, is the absence of the Will to Unity. Not so much among the masses as among educated and much respected leaders. A hundred and fifty years ago the British in India found it necessary in order to ensure good government to bring all the provinces under a unitary Government with a Governor General at its head. This system was continued and emphasised when the British Crown took over the Government from the East India Company. All the progress made so far has been due primarily to this unitary system. Under the Montagu-Chelmsford scheme a large amount of autonomy was delegated to the Provinces but the unitary frame work was maintained. We may add that for a thousand years India has prospered when there was a strong central Government and languished when the provinces were left to have their own way. Suddenly, at the Round Table Conference it was decided to cut up British India into eleven separate statutory entities as a preliminary to their federating with the Indian States. We have searched the Round Table Conference proceedings in vain to discover why this was done. In the natural course, British India would have been the predominant partner in the Federation. Her educational, social and political ideas would have shaped the course of the Federation and gradually the unity of British India would have comprised the States also. This, apparently, was the very thing that the separation of the provinces was meant to prevent. And it was accepted by British Indian delegates of unquestionable eminence and integrity. We are, therefore, justified in saying that the Will to Unity does not really exist however much we may talk about it.

Campaign for a Higher Birthrate:—In his political speeches Lord Eustace intends to emphasise the necessity for more children. The heads of the churches and several eminent medical men propose to conduct similar propaganda in their own spheres. The only newspaper in London to report this "drive" is the "People", and according to the report in this journal the League of National Life is aiming to point out that if the present fashion of one or two children per family continues, there will be a drastic reduction of the population in another two generations. Moreover, Britain will develop into a nation of old age pensioners, for while the improved national health is ensuring greater longevity, the young children will not be coming along to keep the population evenly balanced.

TURKEY UNDER KEMAL ATATURK.

The assumption that Europe represents a unit of civilisation is generally accepted more for convenience than as a matter of fact. Neither under Pope nor Emperor was the ideal of European unity fully achieved. The greatest factor against this development in the pre-War world was the Ottoman Empire. The most powerful influence against it in post-War Europe is Soviet Russia. But the problem for Europe is still the same, the assimilation of a stubborn opposition. And both pre-War Turkey and post-War Russia turn to Asia to withstand the assimilating force. Turkey and Russia have changed places. For as Russia discarding nationalism turned to the world idea of communism, Turkey gave up the ideal of Pan-Islam and took on Western Nationalist ideals. Under the Sultans too Turkey was not against Europeanisation. She was against too rapid change and had very often to resist foreign aggression by reverting to older ideals. But it was under Kemal Ataturk that the State realised, as modern China has done now, that in modernisation, swift and thorough, lay Turkey's one chance of survival. If she was to exist in the midst of Europe, she had to cultivate the European mentality. And Europe which in Russia intervened to prevent the abandonment of European ideals, stepped in significantly enough in Turkey on the side of the reactionaries who opposed Westernisation. Having broken up the Ottoman Empire and divided its spoils, the Great Powers preferred to maintain an enfeebled theocracy. But the attempt failed. The reason why Turkey had to go farther in her occidental reforms than Japan which, after all, has only adopted Western technique, is that her geographical position in the world necessitated it, even as a mere measure of self-defence. That she was able to do so successfully was because Turkey—after the loss of her Christian-inhabited possessions and North African territories—was European, as the rest of Eastern Europe. Therein is the main reason why Kemal Ataturk succeeded where Amanullah Khan failed in Afghanistan. Mr. Henry Elisha Allen has given us in "The Turkish Transformation" (The University of Chicago Press, Price $ 2.50), a brilliant study of the modern Turkish movement which reveals how completely altered is the outlook of the average Turk.

A great force in bringing European ideas to Asiatic countries is the missions and one would have expected modern Turkey to have depended greatly on missionary institutions for support in their work of reformation. Mr. Allen reveals in his book that Kemal Ataturk had to establish a strict control over proselytising agencies before he launched his programme. Not only because of its peculiar interest to India but also on account of the frequent charge brought up against Turkey that it is anti-religious, it will be worth while to consider this aspect in detail. The first reason why missions had to be watched in Turkey was that they represented foreign interests. From this followed the second charge that in their schools foreign ideals were indoctrinated into the students. The defence lawyer's argument in the well-known case against the Bursa school-teachers in 1928, accepted the dangers of allowing conversion activities but pleaded that the present of a New Testament or the saying of prayers in groups or even the singing of religious songs did not constitute proselytising work. As thorough as the Soviet, Turkey banned the reading of 'Longman's Grammar' and 'Silas Marner.' Mr. Allen comments: "Although each point of accusation taken by itself seems to be of trifling consequence, when presented en masse the effect is one over which the Turks can hardly be blamed for becoming worried. Missionaries might have felt impelled to present their message of Christian love by whatever methods were open to them but the Turks would have been blind indeed if they had failed to see that under the surface forces were stirring which would be bound to have a profound influence on their religious, social and national life."

On the denationalising effect of Christian education the book throws special light. The author quotes a prominent American educator in Turkey on the ideal before the American mission school. "If through fear or favour, American colleges seek to withhold their witness to the essential truth of their religion, they will lose not only the respect of those who differ from them but also the possibility of broadening and liberalising the young who do not know in their own countries any forms of religion which are largely not corrupted by superstition and meaningless forms." Every other religion is occupied with reforming itself but the Christian mission, with a smug faith that it is not like the others, concerns itself with the faults of other religion. The indictment from the Turkish side is more serious. The following passage from various extracts in the book is representative of the strength of Turkish feeling: "The duty of a school is to give education; the function of education is to inoculate the younger generation with the thoughts, feelings, desires and ideals of the society to which it belongs. These can only be firmly established in the spirits of conscious and cultivated mature members of that society. And only they can inoculate the younger generation with these things. Hence American and foreign schools in general in Turkey are meaningless and, therefore, functionless empty institutions. Our ideas about education are current and respected in every civilised country. The object of the foreign school is foreign culture. It turns away Turkish youth from the society to which they belong to another society and carries them toward a foreign ideal. The foreign school not only fails to create capacities for the social and national environment, it produces young people who gradually get out of harmony with the spiritual life of their environment. Turkish children who study in the American school hanker after American life and desire to live in America. In the classrooms and corridors are masterpieces of the world's art. But they did not have a single thing which concerned Turkey. The only thing Turkish is the air and the sunshine. They forget Turkey among their art works, a treacherous frame of mind to the country of their adoption. They live apart like a different state within the community." Mr. Allen concludes that Turkey is no place for a missionary who is not willing to forego all ideas of proselytising and to devote himself wholeheartedly to the task of helping Turkey develop according to her own genius, supplying only such Western or Christian viewpoints as the Turks themselves call upon him to suggest. No wonder missionaries in India with the experience of other nationally awakened countries start at every shadow. In view of the drastic measures adopted in Turkey and other states, Dr. Paranjypte's valuable suggestion for invalidating the conversion of minors and making registration compulsory for changes of faith is perfectly innocuous but it has a roused considerable missionary opposition, the unconvincing argument against it being that it is an encroachment on individual rights.

There is an interesting comparison between the outlook of the modern Turk and the point of view of the political-minded Indian which Mr. Allen reproduces from a Turkish journalist. "We do not say to the people," says the writer, "Return to the industry of the fireside; boycott foreign merchandise; become positive again." On the contrary we say to them, 'Let us industrialize; let us perfect technique; accord importance to those branches of industry which can be developed among us and assure their success.' Our doors are open to the merchandise which is not or cannot be produced in our country." The Indian industrial problem is entirely different from that of Turkey. There are few things that cannot be produced in this country although there are few things that are produced today. The scope for industrial initiative is limited to a degree undreamt of. There is not that will in the State to speed up industrialisation which exists under dictatorships. And in the men who control our destinies from six thousand miles away, there still persists the raw-material attitude of mind, even a progressive thinker like Lord Snowden urging improvement in Indian living conditions in the interests of British trade. The Indian politician who started public life with the ambitions of the Turkish writer would be doomed to early disillusionment.

W. C. BONNERJEE LEGENDS.

Mr. Sachchidananda Sinha writes: "I was rather shocked to read in the article of Professor K. Sundararaman Aiyar in the Hindu Congress number that Mr. Bonnerjee had married an English lady. I knew Mrs. Bonnerjee very well. She was not only an Indian lady but a Brahmin by birth. It is perfectly true that late in life she had embraced Christianity, but she was no more English than you and I. I wonder how the Madras Professor got this mythological story in his head. It may be that Mr. Bonnerjee said to him what he is reported to have said: but it could possibly have no reference to an English wife, since he never had any. When in 1911 Mahatma Gandhi, speaking at the second Round Table Conference, said that Mr. Bonnerjee, the first Congress President, was a Christian, his daughter sent a contradiction to the Press. Since then, she has passed away and, as one who had the privilege of knowing Mr. Bonnerjee intimately, I think it my duty to send this contradiction to you since you have referred prominently to the fact of Mr. Bonnerjee having lived and died a Hindu." We are glad to publish this contradiction for more than one reason apart from that given by Mr. Sinha. First, because it brings out clearly—the more clearly because it is entirely unintended—how little even Indians of advanced views in social matters care nowadays to be mistaken for Englishmen. Mr. Sinha was actually shocked to see an Indian lady represented as an English woman and an eminent Indian leader as having married an Englishwoman. In the days of Bonnerjee's youth there was quite a craze to imitate everything English; and to marry an Englishwoman was regarded as an achievement as Karl Marx, the converted Jew, felt when he married a German girl. One of the first Indians who entered the Indian Civil Service, by passing the Examination in London, committed suicide when he overheard a contemptuous remark about him by the daughter or sister of a British colleague at the European club to which he was admitted by virtue of his office. The craving for English Society has almost disappeared and, except in rare cases, we hardly hear nowadays complaints, like Sir Chimanlal Setalvad's, of the exclusiveness of English Clubs in India. The feeling rather is, "better let them stew in their own juice if they want to" On the other hand, Englishmen now complain of the exclusiveness of Hindu and Muslim society. In the days of the Partition agitation when bombs and pistols first made their sinister appearance in Indian politics, Europeans sought out railway compartments occupied by Indians as being comparatively safer. During the last two or three years, young Indians who married European wives have found them in the Continent. After Mrs. Margaret Sanger's recent testimonial to Indian women as being the most beautiful in the world, even when they lived in slums, such of our young men who appreciate Indian things only after they have received the imprimatur of some European or American, may learn to look at their countrywomen with appreciative eyes. Mrs. Sanger's propaganda, if promiscuously adopted, will make the women of India the most hideous instead of the most beautiful women in the world. Harold Begbie noticed the queenly gait of the women workers as they came out of some Indian Mills which he visited, in contrast to the slouching manner of their Lancashire counterparts. Searching for a reason, he hit upon the Indians' belief in the nearness of the Unseen as the most likely one. Ideals, some one has said, do add a oubit to men's stature. Would a Hindu wife, who hides a set of birth control appliances in her sari as she takes the seven sacred steps with her bridegroom round the sacred fire, be the same as the one who implicitly believes that the saptapadi links her soul to that of her husband not only till death "do us part" but for all time and eternity? This is all rather foolish to Mrs. Sanger. When I told her, at the interview to which she was good enough to invite me, that the family in the East is principally parents and children and the husband-wife relation is not the pivotal factor as it is in the West she did not seem to understand.

To return to Mr. Sinha's letter. Professor Sundaraman was my Professor in History and he was an admirable teacher. His enthusiasm was infectious. I still retain a memento of it in the big blotch on a page of my copy of Maine's "Early History of Institutions" on which he was lecturing, caused by an animated foot upsetting an ink bottle. Conscientious as a teacher of history, Sundaraman was apt to mistake inferences for facts—like the writer of the Bengal Administration Report about Pandit Jawharlal Nehru—where Hindu social integrity was concerned. In the article in the Hindu to which Mr. Sinha refers, he says "knowing that he (Bonnerjee) had married an English lady while studying at the English Bar, I ventured to ask him what were his views regarding the future of Hindu society and its ideals." As an example of "the fallacy of many questions" this statement will be hard to beat. Why should Bonnerjee or any body else, because he had married an English wife, be supposed to be able to forecast more correctly than another who has married an Indian lady, the future of Hindu society and its ideals? There was no English wife in Bonnerjee's case, as Mr. Sinha makes it clear. But assuming that there was one, how does the acquisition qualify one to predict the future of Hindu society? The fact is, the Professor was not really seeking Bonnerjee's opinion in order to benefit by it. He was really twitting him with having strayed from the sanctified way of Hindu custom without knowing anything about Hindu ideals and thinking about the future of Hindu society. Bonnerjee, the eminent lawyer that he was, perfectly understood that he was being heckled. He did not want to start a discussion on the very complex question of the future of Hindu society when he was inaugurating a political movement. His answer merely meant that they need not quarrel about the future and that the Professor should go his own way while Bonnerjee went on his. This is evident from the fact, to which Mr. Sinha would be able to testify, that Bonnerjee did not then or afterwards change or endeavour to change to the orthodox manner of life. How did Gandhiji come to make the mistake at the Round Table Conference about Bonnerjee having become a convert? It is, again, the imp of Inference stepping into the shoes of Fact. At the Conference Gandhiji was intent on showing to the Round Tablers that the Congress was not a Hindu stunt but that it represented the best minds of all communities. Dadabhai Naoroji and Pherozesha Mehta represented Parsidom in all its greatness; Badrudin Tyebji and Sayani were there to testify to the adherence of the powerful Muslim minority; Hume and Wedderburn stood for the fine old tradition of the founders of the British Indian Empire. An Indian Christian was needed to complete the circle. Bonnerjee was the most Angliuised Indian that ever was—"he lived every inch the life of an Englishman" writes Mr. Sinha "from the wave of his hand to the lighting of his cigar." Gandhiji is not a Professor of History—in fact history is rather his weak point—but everything he does is inspired by a religious motive and, judging of Bonnerjee by his own standard, it was inevitable that he should find conversion to Christianity to be the only sufficient reason for adopting the English mode of life, and concluded that this must have happened in the case of Bonnerjee. That any one should assimilate so thoroughly the externals of western civilisation leaving out the religious core of it, is unthinkable to a mind constituted like Gandhiji's. There is no doubt or hesitation in the words which he used at the Conference. "I can recall," he said, "at least one Indian Christian (in the Congress group) at the present moment, W. C. Bonnerjee." The Dnyanodaya, looking at the question from an entirely different point of view, inclines to persist in making Bonnerjee a convert to Christianity. It avers that if it erred, it did so in the excellent company of Gandhiji. Mr. Sinha does not tell us whether Gandhiji corrected his mistake when Bonnerjee's daughter pointed it out in the Press. If he did, the Dnyanodaya can not claim to err in his company.

CASTE: AND MUST IT GO?

A passing thought of writing a few lines on the vexed question of the abolition of caste occurred to me a few weeks ago; but by an oversight it was not possible to think of it in time, that is, recur to it before the matter was actually before the Hindu Maha Sabha. The editorial, "The Need of the Hour" in the Indian Social Reformer of Bombay in its issue of the 4th January, lays great stress on the teachings of the Gita countenancing no caste and sex whatsoever, and regrets that the great Acharyas paid no heed to the social implications of the Gita. True, they did not; and rightly and wisely, for two reasons. First, the philosophic religion of the Gita was independent of the Hindu social structure, as the learned Editor very rightly says, relating as it does to the soul of man in its relation to the All-pervading Almighty. Secondly, it was dependent on it, rather built on it, though it would often ask a man to transcend all social limits, without offending social conscience. Slokas 29-31 of the 9th chapter illustrate the former and 32-83 the latter aspect. With a non-Hindu wherever living on the globe the former reason would prevail. To a Hindu both the latter and the former would appeal at once, as having a peculiar significance to him. For the caste system, though now perverted and distorted, is yet in its old and worn-out implication alive and is not altogether dead and has stood the test of time. In fact Hinduism means a religion based on the caste-system.

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Jan. 18

It is deep-rooted in the blood of a Hindu, however fallen he be for the time being. Like the late W. C. Bonnerjee, every Hindu, be he high or low, would exclaim, "You will be simply astonished to hear that I am altogether in favour of a strict adherence to our orthodox views and customs. Do not judge of me by what I am." It is just like the loose man indifferent to morals being severe against similar looseness and indifference on the part of his own wife and children. The ideal or standard of conduct is always much higher than the limit actually reached in practice of the same. The present-day caste may be very low in the practice of the ideal standard originally fixed. Even now it cannot be easily denied that at least one in a thousand continues to practise it in the spirit in which it was first conceived, notwithstanding the completely altered conditions.

Because of the identification of caste with Hinduism one has to feel and think that the one is body and the other is soul; and that in this mundane world they go together. Even as avatars of Vishnu are mundane manifestations of the Almighty, so also the worship of the impersonal God has in India taken the form of worship of the Deity in His various forms in all visible and tangible ways amenable to easy grasp of each individual's varying innate Bhakti. As the Gita points out, the soul of man can be easily realised but even then not the All-pervading God latent in the same, though the former success may lead to the other in course of time. That is to say the Bhakti cult may easily lead to the impersonal realisation of the Universal Soul within the heart of the atomic individual soul of man. In other words, caste is the Shula sarira and Bhakti form of worship is the Sukshma sarira of Hinduism. Hence it is that Sankara and Ramanuja never meddled with caste but, even as the Sruti, Smriti, Upanishads and the Gita, had accepted it as conducive to the healthy and fuller life of Hinduism, and as the sine qua non thereof. Even the revered sages of old from Manu to Vyasa went to the extent of predicting only Varna-sankaryam or confusion of castes, as Kali advanced, which is a very different thing from disappearance or abolition of caste altogether. They knew the tendencies of the institution of caste even then and gave us the easy means of rehabilitating it whenever it underwent deterioration or received rude shocks. Manu would say that in every generation (yuga) there must be a reshuffling of the castes by raising or lowering the status of individuals and families on the ladder of the main caste-system. Sri Ramanuja is said to have availed himself of this provision of law and asked his seventy-four disciples to look to it among the communities committed to their charge. The plan could not be long stuck to by the lesser men since succeeding to the 74 gadis. Why not the matadhipatis and Acharya-purushas and their compeers of to-day, be asked by our legislatures to resume the lost thread and work the caste-system so as to make it do its old and wonted service to the society? So long as the Hindu society is composed of enormous numbers of layers or strata of men in all degrees and shades of civilisation and culture, there is no meaning in levelling all down to the same bottom. There must be ever-recurring attempts at elevating the lower orders by proper levers.

The rich agricultural classes among Sudras who have long ceased to touch meat and drink could easily form the old Vaisya caste and given the benefit of Vedic samskaras at the instance of the State by the religious heads. The martial classes in several parts of India can easily form the Kshatriyas of old and given the due samskaras. The so-called panchamas or adi-dravidas may be asked to give up the objectionable food, drink and ways of life and thereupon may be allowed the free intercourse with the inferior classes among Sudras. As Atri of old said, the Brahmins are themselves divided into ten or even more classes or groups according to calling. And to-day these groups have showed the way to evolution of similar groups among other castes owing to differences in callings. And why not these have free marital intercourse between themselves and begin to rise and raise others with them on the ladder of caste all the more easily? This is certainly Manu's programme grandly conceived but sadly given up for want of proper and efficient State-control. Fresh life would be imparted to the stereotyped skeleton of a caste-system. The free, anuloma marriages also must go forth side by side to implement the work of the religious heads in this behalf. It will then be seen that the Hindu community throbs with a new and vigorous life and pulsates with a yearning to rise and improve more and more with the least room for the present-day caste recriminations. In other words, caste must be kindled and made to live a truer life and do a truer function as when it began in olden ages. Regeneration of Caste is all that is urgently needed.

AMERICA FACES THE EAST. (By WALTER BROOKS FOLEY.)

Slowly, but surely, the people of the United States are turning their attention to the stirring changes taking place in Asia. At the same time they are learning more and more of the motives and difficulties of Europe.

The belief is increasing that Asia is rising to greater importance in world affairs while Europe is declining in international influence.

This shift has not happened and will not take place immediately. Yet it appears inevitable. So, as one citizen of the United States, this writer has spent five years as student of India and has recently moved his residence to Manila, the capital of the Philippine Islands.

To begin our new study and experience of Asia we felt the necessity of seeing the States of America as they are spread before the observer after a six year depression period, the greatest and worst of American history. We wished to understand and evaluate the present temper of life in the United States.

We began our trip in Oyster Bay and continued by car across country toward the Pacific Coast, sailing eventually from Portland, Oregon, the beautiful city on the banks of the Willamette River.

A list of the States which we visited, adding also a Province of Canada, will indicate the extent to which we were able to accomplish our purpose to "see America first." Here it is.

New York, (Eastern) New Jersey, Pennsylvania, New York (Western), Ontario, Canada, Michigan, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, Nebraska, Kansas, Colorado, Wyoming, Idaho, Oregon, Washington.

Add to this background an extensive correspondence with residents of other States, plus numerous visits to New England cities and towns, and we have the base of a new pyramid of understanding to be erected out of Far Eastern material. All this in addition to wide travels in the United States in 1925, 1926, and 1931, plus a localized residence in the vicinity of New York between 1931 and 1935.

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

We were fortunate in many ways as we made our plans to start for Manila. Everything went smoothly. The advice of valued friends gave us encouragement. Preliminary visits and interviews worked out to perfection. Each idea dovetailed with all the others. There was no grinding of gears. Even the weather worked in our favor.

We made our first decision in the Adirondack mountains in the delightful camp of Dr. and Mrs. F. B. Stockdale on Twitchell Lake. The location made for clarity of thinking and gave us opportunity for careful conference with thoughtful friends.

We felt we were in the midst of friends constantly and that we were moving on among friends to a new world of friends. Actually on such a foundation the world of the future must and is to be built.

We have always been interested in co-operative measures of faith and fellowship. Our acceptance of that principle has often given us success while only defeat could have been expected under another banner.

So, our helpful relatives, Mr. and Mrs. Frank Kelly came to Oyster Bay, lived with us in the "packing period," ran the household, gathered our possessions together and consigned them to boxes which were later sent in every geographical direction.

A brother, Frank, arrived and a sister-in-law who worked over a busy week-end to bring final order out of chaos.

Friends were in and out always helpful, always kindly, though not always understanding why we were leaving delightful associations to go to a totally new environment. Yet they bade us farewell with invitations innumerable to visit them on our return—if and when!

Leaving New York was not just driving across Queensboro Bridge and 57th street to the over-head highway along the Hudson. It was not seeing the Empire State Building and Riverside Church recede into the distance. It consisted rather in thinking of our new experiences-to-be in the same terms as taking the short 125th Street Ferry ride from Manhattan to New Jersey—in the knowledge that the Eastern and Western hemispheres are drawing increasingly close together.

On this trip we missed the Sky-way over the New Jersey meadows. But we entered Hackensack by a new overland and river bridge which avoids several congested centers. The engineering feat is a symbol of what we must do in social relations—recognize difficulties in certain types of human traffic—and avoid them.

Planning of a wide variety of types is evident in the United States. Some of the developments look hit-or-miss (like the view of Hollis and vicinity from the Northern State Parkway, where some builder proved the fact of his one-track mind in designing roof-tops and houses each exactly like every other.) But over and again we were caught with the significance of carefully thought-out plans carried to completion.

The experiment of a new type of highway light that eliminates shadows and will help to prevent motor accidents, is evidence of the recognized necessity to care better for people. Travel needs to be made increasingly safe—and is being so made by thoughtful scientific minds.

At the beginning of our continental trip we were impressed once more that, though depression and bank failures and loss of employment come and go now as never before, Mr. and Mrs. American Citizen have struck a balance of judgment in local and world affairs that has the possibility of making them valuable residents in the new world that is being fashioned around the globe, but particularly in the continent and bordering islands of Asia.

When many expected Americans to revolt and overturn ideas of generations, they accepted new ideas without revolting—they proved their ability to experiment.

So long as Americans can experiment, fail and try again, we need have no fear of disaster. New Jersey some time ago, opened a toll bridge on the Pennsylvania line to free traffic. It is a sign of advancing progress when we will build bridges of understanding in all our relationships and stop putting hindrances in the way of those who might better be friends than foes.

Many people will probably be dissatisfied when they pass through the pearly gates to Paradise. For they will find just outside and just inside so many ordinary human affairs still being carried on. They will expect something totally different and will meet the same kind of people as on earth.

There is something of that sort of experience in proceeding through the Delaware Water Gap where ages ago the ice tore out a channel for a great river and where now the moon gleams quietly over the high cliffs above the modern Delaware flowing on to the sea.

Years ago honeymooning couples found their way to this spot in almost as great profusion as they did to Niagara. Now the great hotel where they stayed is in ruins. But tourists from distant points slow up to see the beauty of the river and the hills, stay briefly at curio shops or overnight in a charming cabin.

So we go through the beautiful natural gateway and people conduct their normal affairs as of old. The quaint city of Stroudsburg clasps our hand in passing and we roam down into Paradise Valley, slightly off the main stream of traffic.

Some one had the vision to pur for the most of the distance through the Valley one of the best-laid cement highways in eastern United States. A lovely small river runs beside the road. A spot where we have often stopped for an open-air lunch beside the river is now being built upon. A cabin is going up under the direction of one who appreciates a quiet resting place.

On either side of the valley the ridges of the Poconos stand out. A few leaves are yellow and red from the fingers of the frost. Filling stations that assist our progress are spaced at longer intervals and indicate less strenuous competition than on some other highways we might mention. The petrol filling stations are symbols of the failure of excessive competition, for competition is the death as well as the life of trade.

The road leads us upward from the valley to slopes from which we can look back over the way we have come. It is a good moment. For the beauty of success is there as well as failure.

Not all of the best experiences are ahead. Some we have had can never be taken away from us. It is good to recall Calcutta and Lahore and Boston and Lake Ronkonkoma and Washington and Singapore and Mandalay and Asansol and Stratford-on-Avon.

Sullivan's Trail lies to the east of one section of the Susquehema River. One can still see where the trees were cut out to make way for the wheels of the wagons carrying his supplies.

In that country the visible evidences of early days are still present. One thousand-acre farm which we visited is still in the same family which settled in that section. The site of a planned colony for royal refugees of the French Revolution can be seen in a fertile valley with the river flowing placidly beside the farmed fields.

Tunkannock and Laceyville and Towanda and Skinner's Eddy whisper of the days when ferries were the only means of crossing the river, when lumbering was a good means of livelihood, when game was prolific, when white men were taking over great territories from the red men.

It is not necessary to go to the Far West to be close to pioneering adventures. We found them in the Pennsylvania hills.

The river was high and muddy due to excessive rains above, that had overflowed the banks of smaller tributaries. Here and there little gardens along the bank had been flooded out and the work of weeks destroyed. But the power of the river was, for the most part, a controlled force.

There is something terrible about uncontrolled might whether it be a car in the hands of a drunken driver or the deluge of a monsoon.

The history of advancing civilization is that of controlling power. There is still much running wild that needs guidance and direction.

Whether the politicians should control business or economists control government remains to be seen. We can agree that some control—either voluntary or compulsory—is required. The new highway by the Susquehema does not follow Sullivan's Trail.

THE EVOLUTION OF HINDUISM.*

(His HIGHNESS MAHARAJA GAEKWAR OF BARODA.)

In America last year, I had the privilege and pleasure of presiding at the World Conference of Religions. It was one of the most interesting experiences of my life, for gathered under one roof were distinguished exponents of every religion and creed. It was indeed a Parliament of Religions in which we were assembled together for the purpose of pooling our knowledge, convictions and experience. We hoped that through our discussions we might arrive at a truer conception of essentials and a truer understanding of what religion could contribute to the solution of our individual and collective problems. It was a memorable gathering and the effect it had upon me personally was to confirm my belief in the essential unity of all religions and in the primary importance of frank discussion and constant study.

During my subsequent travels, and particularly of late, I have devoted much time to the study of current trends in religion in India and other countries. I have sought, when opportunity offered, to bring together men of learning, culture and experience, in order that I might listen to them and benefit from their views and understanding and from an expert knowledge to which I can make no claim. In the hope that something may thereby be added to our store of knowledge, to our capacity for understanding and to our desire for study, I have prepared a short series of discourses which indicate the nature of my recent reflections and of certain conclusions at which I have arrived. For the first of these discourses I have chosen the subject of "the Evolution of Hinduism."

All sects and schools accept the Bhagwad Gita as their text books. They realise that in its 'shlokas' (श्लोक) there is authority for all kinds of teachings and practices; it is all-inclusive. It is itself an Upanishad, and one specially adapted to the needs of the laity; and has for two thousand years inspired and comforted millions. It makes three schools or ways—Karma Yoga, Bhakti Yoga, Jnyana Yoga—clear and attractive. These all have their roots in the earlier Upanishads and in religious experience, and they all are needed for a fully rounded religious life—the whole personality, will, emotion, and intellect being involved. Again the moral teachings of Duty, Detachment, Desirelessness, Devotion, are of permanent value. For the Gita is the layman's Upanishad, and sets the life of duty above the life of renunciation—Dharma above Saanyasa. If we analyse this comprehensive book, we see that it is made up of eighteen chapters and that these fall into three books, dealing with Karma, Bhakti, and Jnyana, and that while all are concerned with each of these three ways, the emphasis is on Karma in the first six chapters, on Bhakti in the second six and on Jnyana in the last six. "Do your duty without attachment" is the main teaching of Krishna in the first of these books:—"Do it in loving devotion to me" is His teaching in the second:—"Illumination is the fruit of action and of devotion," that is the burden of the third book. The saints are those who have realised this supreme truth.

The great moral summaries of the 16th chapter are notable.

The Gita provides a ladder for the lay people to climb to salvation. It may also suggest a syllabus of religious education for our schools; which must aim at training the whole personality. Devotion to a personal God of noble character does this best. But to Bhakti we must add Karma.

Let us then look upon the Gita as our source book and without being bound by the letter seek the spirit of its teachings, balance one against another, and correct some emphasis by the collective impression of the whole. Thus if Krishna seems to teach in one place that men are puppets of a God who has His sport with them and the world, this is corrected by His continual emphasis on duty; man is responsible and free to choose good or evil. Again if Maya seems to imply the unreality of matter as Vedantists have insisted, there are many passages which say that matter is eternal, and that life is real. The world is in fact not unreal, except as contrasted with the one supreme reality—it is this Atman which gives all a measure of reality, for it is in all. And in realising it as the soul and breath of all, man finds salvation.

The very comprehensiveness of the Gita has meant that various teachings have been over-emphasised by various schools, and even perverted, e.g. the caste-system becomes too rigid; or Bhakti becomes erotic; and Maya becomes a denial of the reality of the world. For the intellectuals Jnyana is emphasised, with its Advaita philosophy, or monism. This has the danger of pantheism, e.g., obliteration of moral distinctions. For the masses Bhakti is taught with its dualisms of God and the soul; this has the danger of particularism, and over-devotion to some local deity. For the priests Karma becomes a matter of religious and ritual acts, with the danger of priestcraft. For the warrior it becomes a matter of acts of bravery, with the danger of callousness.

The emphasis on Bhakti has been overdone by devotees like Chaitanya and by the common people, who give their devotion to unworthy idols till the Puranic Krishna takes the place of the noble Krishna of the Gita, or Kali is appeased with bloody sacrifices, and Ahimsa forgotten. Eroticism may go to extreme lengths, as symbols are too realistically interpreted, e.g. the Devadasis and the Jus primus noctis of priests of some sects. Even the moral lesson of Upeksha may be perverted, as by anarchists who appeal to the authority of Krishna in committing murder. Without trained and spiritually minded teachers the emphasis will continue to be one-sided and poetry will be read as prose.

This is the tragic story of religion. And Indians, too often unhappy and unsuccessful against the forces of nature and men, have sought in Sannyasa (संन्यास) or in romantic visions of an unreal world of gods to escape. This is romanticism. We want realism. And the Gita has both. It tells that the Unseen is Real: Plato and Saint Paul agree. But like them it says that the earthly scene is also real, and that man must do the tasks of today in the light of eternity. This teaching is today almost lost. On one side there is the over-emphasis on Vedantic monism—over-subtlety; on the other the over-stressing of the Krishna-cult. But a middle path is needed. We must find a God who is in His world, making it real, and yet not exhausted by His world; and the Gita does hint at such a God—in-carnates Him from age to age when unrighteousness triumphs and righteousness grows weak.

Side by side in the Gita are Sankhya Vedanta and Theism. All cannot be true; if one is, the others are not: if there is one personal God as Theism requires, there cannot be only one impersonal reality, or two eternal realities as these schools teach. But the Gita offers these alternative emphases, and often interpreters turn poetry into prose. Of these philosophies, Theism, with its emphasis on personality, is the only tenable one. Man—a person—must think in terms of personality and emphasise personal values. In India much new emphasis must be laid upon human needs and upon the value and meaning of human life. Life is good; man must live fully and purposefully; in serving his fellows he is honouring God; God is father of all, and has no favourites; men must behave as brothers; such simple and profound truths need restating and incarnating in action. So Bhakti and Karma will lead unto Jnyana a new vision of truth.

Indian reformers from Buddha to Dayanand Saraswati have been largely concerned with reshifting of emphasis. Such a reformer is now needed to blaze a middle path between (a) scepticism and superstition, (b) religiosity and secularism, (c) other worldliness and mere worldliness, (d) Dharma in its rigid forms and Adharma in its anarchical forms, (e) Maya in the sense of unworldly ambition and the utter denial of the meaning of life. In this reform the human values must be re-affirmed—and the true nature of God; Sat (सत्) Chit (चित्) Anand (आनन्द) re-asserted; God in His world making it real: so idols must be distinguished as good symbols (as for example Krishna and his flute) and bad symbols (e. g. the Lingam) which lead to bad practices by over emphasising sex. The goodness of life and its joys must be boldly asserted. The prayer, From the unreal to the real, From darkness to light, From death to life, must be intelligently explained and used. And Reality, Light, Life must be interpreted in more ethical terms and related to modern life.

The Upanishadic teachings of transcendental truth, of one Reality are accompanied by simple ethical maxims. But our categories of personality and of values are lacking. The old order is passing and as India enters the full and complex life of today, she needs a new statement of social and individual ethics. Life is real, not illusory; and good, not evil. Man must live in the world and keep himself detached from its false lures. Let us keep the Upanishadic spirit and adapt it to the new needs: e. g. salvation must mean harmonious and useful living. The disinterested quest of Truth—not of mere mystical experiences. The relative ethic of the four Ashramas is sound, but must be freed of the rigidity of caste. The freedom and intellectual interests of Upanishadic women, and the acceptance of inter-caste marriages are examples of the value of the Upanishadic ethics, even in the totally different world of today. But it is idle to use them as the beginning and end of wisdom. And even the Gita needs re-enforcing and re-interpreting. It has no teaching on some of our most pressing problems, and it gives no adequate place to women, whose emancipation and education is the main task of modern India. Chauvinism and true patriotism are at war in this vital field—new Kurukshetra.

If we seek in another direction, we find in the teaching of Buddha a middle path of sanity and moderation which has still much to teach us. Rooted like the Gita in the early Upanishads, the middle path of Shaky Muni avoids the extremes of religiosity and scepticism, of worldliness and austerity, of legalism and revolt from law. It teaches two paths—one for busy people a way of simple morality,—“Do good, cease from evil, cleanse the thoughts of the mind.” By good Karma bad Karma is to be counteracted, and by occasional doses of monastic observance the laity may nerve their wills and kindle their affection for the Buddha and his law. “He that attaches himself to me with love and faith,” says an early scripture, “will go to heaven.” This is the way, and this is the goal for lay people, a better rebirth by way of personal loyalty to the founder, his law and his order—three jewels of Buddhism. But for disillusioned and world-weary people, there is a higher goal to be reached by a more-difficult road. “He that aspires for—Nibbana (निब्बान)—cessation of evil and re-birth, let him tread the Eightfold Aryan Path”. This is a ladder for the mystic—beginning in right views, ending in rapture and ecstasy. Shaky Muni is in fact the great Yogi or Rishi represented in early sculptures, “Like a flame in a windless place,” eyes closed and hands folded. He is also like Krishna an active teacher exhorting and questioning, as other sculptures show him. Krishna and Shaky Muni were both Kshatriyas and both made their appeal to the will through the affections. So may enlightenment—Bodhi or Jnyana be reached.

From Buddhism, in fact, Hinduism absorbed much; its emphasis on Ahimsa and on Upeksha, detachment: the clear recognition that desire is the great enemy; its devotion to the Guru. Buddhism in fact stands between the Upanishads and Gita. From the Upanishads it takes the concept of a great mystic experience. This is alone Real. In this, man is one with Atma. This is gained in both teachings by morality and ascetic practices. But Buddha insisted more on the former and less on the latter, and he freed essential Upanishadic teachings from their Brahmanic emphasis; not by sacrifices but by self-discipline must really be won. The Dhammapada or verses of the law may be studied as the best summary of monastic Buddhism: the Sigalo Vada Sutta and the Jatakas for lay Buddhism. What are the essential ethics of these two paths? For the laity the duties are almost the same as those for the Grihastha in Hinduism. And Ashoka's edicts are a useful summary—filial duty, respect for teachers, love of truth, earnestness, and zeal in work, tolerance to all, Ahimsa—these are their main note.

The monk has in addition the duties of his office, periodic fasting and meditation, and above all the duty of teaching. In practice Buddhism means a division of labour. “The monk to preach, the layman to feed and clothe the monk.” This is an exaggeration, and the idea of merit—of buying a good re-birth by such offerings, kills the true nerve of Buddhism, which is kindness to all, attachment to none. Other exaggerations are an over-emphasis on the sanctity of celibate life, and occasional austerities, such as burning the scalp, are even self destruction in the pursuit of Nirvana. The ethical content of this ideal again is largely lost, and it is negatively interpreted as cessation of being. This is as much an aberration on one side as the sensuous paradises of the northern schools are on the other. Shakya Muni refused both extremes. And Buddhism like Hinduism needs to return to sane and serene faith and a wise agnosticism as to the hereafter. It is essentially a doctrine of justice in a world causally controlled, and it begins with the affirmations. 'Not of like result are good and evil.' 'As a man sows so is his harvest'; 'One thing only do I teach—sorrow and its cessation'. That man can be happy; that no capricious demon or God can affect him—that he must work out his salvation—this is the essence of Buddhism. It has been perverted by the abuses against which its founder protested, and is today either a dreary rationalism or a superstitious blend of polytheism and book-keeping.

But the admirable figure of Buddha—calm authoritative, reasonable and kindly—remains, and he and the sanity of his middle path can be recovered from the confusion of the texts. He called himself Elder Brother of men. Subsequent ages have made him God above the gods. He was a mystic with a great experience; schoolmen have made him a rationalist. If he appealed to reason he also appealed to faith. And in challenging the will, he did not neglect the emotions. A great personality, he called out a personal response, and Buddhist saints have been men of strong character. Attacking egoism he has been accused of destroying personality. Attacking religiosity, he has been labelled Atheist. But his was a religious spirit, believing in a just universe and in the power of men to live sanely and temperately. He is India's greatest son, and her ambassador to the rest of Asia. In him the West has a master-key to the understanding of the East.

WOMENS STATUS AND ORGANISATION.

Woman is the true measure of social progress. In her all changes in social life are accurately recorded. She changes when really a change comes. Otherwise she dreams away her time in the expectation of an uncertain future happiness. Her realism lies in the coming future, in her growing child. But man's desires end with economic values. He likes to see that the child grows useful and economically valuable. Man is a realist and woman is an idealist. By nature they are perfect partners. Their mentalities are complementary to each other.

If any society is eager for growth, if it really aspires to realise ultimate happiness, it has to be just to women, it has to enable them to give correct training to that growing generation of which they are in charge. Scientific knowledge must be added to their sentiments and they should have the full freedom of expression and choice.

We are slaves today because our women are slaves. Idealism and the great qualities that surround it are suppressed because its chief inspiration, the heart of woman, is enslaved. The country that wants true freedom, the country that aspires to grow, must free its women first, for with them lies the emotion for the ideal life. As both the law and custom are against her, woman is absolutely powerless. But custom preceded law. Law can maintain it only as long as it exists, as long as there is nothing better to replace it. Government is but a minor phase of the main social life. When social relationship is fundamentally changed, governments are bound to change both in colour and in substance. But how to change the custom, how to reconstruct the whole society into a better order? Only one way there is to do this. That is the method of modernisation, by efficient organisation, militant propaganda and education. Small scale reform in this connection produces nothing but strain on the society as well as on the reformers themselves. It cannot give any results for the real good can come only when the complete mass of womanhood is relieved from the thralldom of custom and ignorance. This is not a question of external morals so that demonstrations and exemplary actions might be undertaken with a view to effect conversions by and by.

If our women should be free, there is the need of a positive large scale programme. All organisations that claim to work for the redemption of the country, including the Indian National Congress, must have their auxiliaries for women as even Turkey had during its period of national rejuvenation. To every university also must be attached auxiliaries for women. Then only even women behind purdah would be able to take part in them—and most of our women are under the curse of purdah of one form or other. There must be considerable agitation towards this end. The society and its reformers should see that education, for a girl in this country specially, does not mean prohibitive expenditure. For in a country like this where industrialisation is at its lowest ebb, no young woman can expect to earn an independent living after finishing her education. Therefore even the middle-class people, not to speak of the poor, will not be inclined to invest any 'capital' on their girls when there is no prospect of adequate 'return.' And unfortunately even the boys are being educated nowadays on this profit and loss basis. But when the social reformer comes to the poorer classes he is not only confronted with seething poverty but also some sort of apathy for a higher life. This is the effect of consistent slavery and social and economic oppression. It is here, when the reformer comes to these people, the poorer classes of the country, that his heart burns in scathing indignation against the privileged 'drones' and he turns his face away from all the problems of education and enlightenment and begins to think only of their economic redemption. But in that perturbed condition of mind, he entirely forgets the reality of realities that freedom, economic or otherwise, lies not in his hands but in the hands of those very poor people for whom he feels so much; that it is they that have to work out their freedom, and that they require some sort of education before they actually realise their condition and are able to imagine what freedom could be. It is for the reformer to see that the poor amidst these very conditions receive education and begin to know what they are and what they could be; and it is for the expert to devise means to convey truth to their very doors. Whether there is unemployment in the middle classes or there is depression in the richer classes, the country does not suffer from or bother about. The country really suffers in its poorer people.

Even there education to the woman is as important as education to the man, if not more. Let it be even going to the poor people and lecturing or reading something to them—this is also education—you must see that women also received your message of truth. If they are behind purdah and cannot come before you, let a woman approach them and give them lessons or lectures, whatever is possible. You cannot wait until purdah is removed. Purdah like many other customs will not leave the society until there is something to replace it. Purdah is nothing but a social formality or habit. No faith or sentiment is involved in it. And it will break of itself when true education permeates social life.

Nothing can remove the impediments in the way of woman's progress except an organised movement conducted on a mass scale. Individual efforts are there but they lead them nowhere. A Mahila Vidyapith here and a Women's Conference there can do very little. And fight for franchise would gain nothing but a false satisfaction. Mass movements, unlike individual actions based on opinion, demand scientific organisation and objective study. Facilities for reformation work will be found only when individuals and faiths dominate the movement. People may lack reason but they possess that instinct to understand what is good and what is bad. They always lack any movement that offers to lead them forward and despise cynics and calculators. If there are failures, they are due to the defects in the organisations that conduct the movements. Not merely scientific but also sincere leadership is necessary. Then only something permanent would survive the efforts of individuals who are always labouring hard to bring the struggle of humanity to a happy end.

SOCIAL WORK IN NAZI GERMANY.

(BY A CORRESPONDENT.)

Shortly before this year's summer vacation, notices were put up in the University of Berlin asking women students to do three weeks' factory work without pay, so as to enable a corresponding number of working women to get a paid vacation. A similar scheme had already been carried out, with conspicuous success, by the University of Konigsberg a year ago. The number of those who volunteered to do that work was so large that the organizers—vis the National Socialist Public Welfare Board and the "Strength through Joy" organization—had some difficulty in making a selection, because not every applicant was considered suitable for the work. Some did not possess the required standard of physical health whilst others lacked the necessary amount of practical training. "Work students" are not exactly a novelty in Germany; but formerly the main object of their work in the factories or elsewhere was to earn money. The social effects resulting from such co-operation between manual and intellectual workers were more or less accidental. To-day, the position is different. Men students and working men get to know one another thanks to their common activities in the Labour Service, the S. A., the S. S., and the Winter Relief organization. Both of them are champions of the same national ideals. It is no longer necessary for them to meet in the factory workshops in order to get acquainted. Women students, on the other hand, are in a different category. They are less intimately associated with the Labour Service, and the two semi-military organizations just named are out of the question altogether in so far as they are concerned. It is therefore particularly necessary to provide means through which they can be brought into contact with the women employed in factories, etc., so that they may obtain a practical knowledge of their life and work, their joys and sorrows, and their social life all round.

NOTES

Miss Katherine Mayo's Book:—The Government of India have prohibited the entry into the country of copies of the book entitled "Face of Mother India" by Miss Katherine Mayo as it contains many passages likely to outrage the religious feelings of Hindus, and also to embitter relations between Hindus and Mussulmans and intensify communal feeling. We are opposed to these prohibitions. When there was a demand in the Legislative Assembly that Miss Mayo's "Mother India" should be banned, we wrote against it. In the first place, such prohibitions are futile. Several copies of the book have probably been sold. Reviews in foreign periodicals have told us something about the contents of the book. In the next place, Miss Mayo's criticisms are not likely to outrage anybody's feelings. India knows her for what she is. Even British newspapers which welcomed her "Mother India" have shown her the cold shoulder this time. One of the most virulent of these was the New Statesman which went beyond Miss Mayo in its invectives against Indians in reviewing the book. It dismisses her new book with a short small type notice this time. "Whether the bleating kids of Benares are a more pitiful spectacle than the stockyards of Chicago", remarks Mr. Robinson Moody "can be judged only by those who have seen both, but Miss Mayo can justly answer by comparison of the motives for slaughter. The Indians kill to please God, the Americans to increase the number of millionaires in Chicago—evidently a far more honourable purpose." Nor is the prophet more honoured in her own country. "Readers who do not share her passionate hatred of Hindu ways", writes Time, "are likely to remain unimpressed by her purple prose, her tirades against native terrorists and agitators. Holding that "terrorism" in India is now devoted to the "overthrow of any non-communist Government..."

by multiplication of single murders, by mass killings," she lists a number of atrocities, suggests that Gandhi's essential purpose is the extermination of the Muslim population, ends with a fervent plea that Mahomedans may not be provoked to attack the British as a result of Hindu intrigues. Turning from this hysterical and somewhat cryptic analysis to the photographs in the volume, readers may get an impression of an India far more serene than Katherine Mayo's words suggest." By banning her book, the Government of India have effectually banned the exposure of the palpable and malignant falsehoods in which the book evidently abounds on their own showing. Such an exposure can be made only in India and by Indians. The world outside India is now deprived of the only means of getting an authoritative refutation of Miss Mayo's inventions. Mrs. Margaret Sanger declared at the All India Women's Conference at Travancore two weeks ago that she had come to make atonement for the misrepresentations of the people of India by one of her countrywomen. The matter might have been allowed to rest there. It is evident that Miss Mayo meant to do a good turn to the Government and she will be heart-broken to see that Government have repaid her by banning her book.

Women under Fascism:—In the interesting articles on "Social Work in Nazi Germany" published in the Reformer, reference is made to measures relating to women. The picture presented by our correspondent brings out the lights but leaves out the shades. The latter are presented in an article in the current Hibbert Journal by Miss Sylvia Pankhurst. She begins with the proposition that Fascism and the emancipation of women are inherently opposed. She proceeds to prove this by citing instances from recent happenings in Italy and Germany. Since Fascism came to power in Italy laws have been passed depriving women of their long enjoyed right to study and teach in Universities. No woman, it is ordained, shall teach a male person over eleven years of age any subject which affects the formation of character. The minimum age of marriage has been reduced from 15 to 14, in pursuance of the policy of encouraging large families. The new Italian law punishes only the abuse of physical correction and discipline by the head of the family towards his wife and children, adopted children and other persons under his paternal authority. The Police are authorised to track runaway wives while husbands are free to go anywhere. Adultery by a wife has been made punishable with two years' imprisonment, while the husband incurs no penalty unless he keeps a mistress. Most astounding is Miss Pankhurst's statement that, since the concordat with Fascism, the Church in Italy may, and actually does, authorise a religious marriage, carrying no civil rights, between persons one or other of whom is already married to some one else! The National Socialist Government in Germany is even more drastic in its attitude to women. All women's organisations have been dissolved. Women are prohibited from holding any office and only ten per cent of women students who pass the Matriculation are admitted to Universities. Only 75 women are allowed to enter the Medical Profession in one year. Marriage loans are made on the distinct condition that the wives who receive them should not engage in wageearning occupations. "Unemployed women are drafted to camps, where they wash, mend and clean, and must undertake to do all work in house, stable, garden and field, and attend lectures in Nazi philosophy after their labour of ten to twelve hours a day is finished. Receiving no wages, with bad food, crowded together in sheds or barns, sleeping on straw, they live under an iron discipline, and are liable to severe punishment." Miss Pankhurst gives some instances of women having been brutally treated for holding opinions opposed to the Nazi regime. One girl had her head shaved and was dragged round the streets with a placard round her neck, for having kept company with a Jew. Of the two, the German regime would seem to be worse as being more thoroughly repressive of women's freedom. "Under Nazi Rule," Miss Pankhurst writes, "Germany compels some of her most intellectually gifted women to such (heavy agricultural) work, under conditions approximating to slavery."

Crusade against Caste Hindus :—B. R. Ambedkar is getting a bit muddled. Addressing a Conference of antyajas in Poona he is reported in the Bombay Chronicle of January 16 to have declared that, even if Mahatma Gandhi fasted unto death in order to persuade them not to leave the Hindu fold, he (the Doctor) would consider that he would be doing it in a wrong cause. Therefore, he would not heed any such steps by Gandhiji. He added: "I have seen his attitude at the time of the Poona Pact and I am convinced that he stands for the caste Hindus." So far as we know, nobody has suggested that Gandhiji should fast in order to prevent Dr. Ambedkar from leading his followers out of the Hindu fold. If Dr. Ambedkar found out at the time of the Poona Pact that Gandhiji stands for caste Hindus, why did he put his signature to it? In the opinion of many, including the present Secretary of State for India, the Pact is unfair to caste Hindus. Dr. Ambedkar is further reported as having said that he expected to carry out his conversion programme in five to ten years and that the Hindus would find themselves then in an unenviable political, social and economic situation as opposed to the Muslims in India. The Muslims did not come to India yesterday. They have been here for twelve centuries, absolute rulers of large parts of the country for many centuries. Dr. Murray Titus, comparing the relative influence of the two religions on each other during the long period, concludes: "When all is said, there seems to be little doubt that Hinduism has wrought a far greater change in Islam than Islam has wrought in Hinduism which still continues to pursue the even tenor of its way with a complacency and confidence that are amazing." We are not overmuch concerned as to what happens to caste Hindus. If Dr. Ambedkar succeeds in reducing them to a minority, we suppose they will demand and get weightages as other minorities do now but at the expense of Muslims and the "scheduled castes" who follow him. The great truths of Hinduism are now safe in the keeping of many forceful minds outside India, and whatever happens to caste Hindus, they will prosper and fructify for the good of humanity.

Hindu Influence on Islam :—There can be no better illustration of the accuracy of Dr. Titus' observation than the wealthy, enterprising and progressive Khoja community, the Golden Jubilee of whose hereditary spiritual and social Chief, His Highness the Right Honourable Sir Aga Khan, was celebrated this week with cordial expressions of esteem and goodwill from all sides. The weighing of the Chief against gold, is a feature of the ancient Hindu coronation ceremony incorporated in the Khoja ritual. The very idea of avatar underlying the Aga Khan's position, is Hindu, especially so in that it is not circumscribed by any limitations as to the manner or mode of manifestation. Socially, the Khojas are a caste like any Hindu caste, standing apart and distinct from other Muslims in the same respects as Hindu castes. It is significant that the two all-India leaders of Indian Muslims today, His Highness the Aga Khan and Mr. Mahomed Ali Jinnah, are both of the same community. Sir Ibrahim Rahimtulla is another eminent all-India leader who belongs to it. The Borahs like the Khojas are also a caste. Both follow, or followed until a few years ago, the Hindu law as regards succession and inheritance. The Borah community, too, has produced eminent leaders. Mr. Justice Badruddin Tyebji, one of the founders of the Indian National Congress, belonged to the sect. He was President of its fourth Session and his address was one of the most weighty delivered on the Congress platform. Sayani was another of the same group who held the presidentship. The venerable Abbas Tyebji, veteran nationalist, is a brother of Badruddin.

His daughter, Mrs. Hamid Ali, occupies an international position as leader of the Indian Women's movement and is one of the most level-headed of the leaders of that movement. Sir Akbar Hydari is another all-India figure. He has raised Hyderabad from its medieval existence to the forefront of progressive India. A small print corrigendum prefixed to the Report of the proceedings of the Second Round Table Conference, supplies an omission in the body of it. At the conclusion of Sir Akbar's speech in the Federal Sub-Committee the Chairman, Lord Sankey, said: "I am sure we are all very much obliged to Sir Akbar Hydari for his speech. If he will permit me to say so, I am sure I am voicing the opinion of the Committee if I use a classical expression and say that, having regard to Sir Akbar's outlook and his experience, he is quite the Nestor of the Conference." That these two small communities which represent the maximum of Hindu influence on Indian Islam should almost monopolise its leadership, is a fact of profound interest to students of inter-communal influence.

Concessions to Antyaja Converts:—For some time past Indian Christian leaders have been demanding that the special concessions granted to the depressed classes of Hindus should be extended to converts from those castes to Christianity. The President of the Indian Christian Conference held in Allahabad some months ago laid stress on it in his address. The Madras Government has complied with the demand. Mr. C. Rajagopala Charya writing in Harijan of January 18, gives the substance of a Government communique he has just read. It says that the school fee exemptions and concessions that Harijan pupils enjoy shall hereafter be extended to the 'scheduled castes' irrespective of conversion to Christianity or any other religion. Neither shall any scholarship holder forfeit any concession already enjoyed by reason of giving up Hinduism. "The school fee amendment," he adds, "is but the end of the wedge. Every concession that is enjoyed or proposed for the Harijans will be the subject matter for revision and extension under pressure from the highly influential quarters that respond to Missionary opinion." We daresay he is right. Christian missionaries who believe in mass conversions find that their resources in men and money, for improving the educational and economic position of the converts, are dwindling owing to the realisation by their patrons in their home countries that there is sufficient scope for Christianising their own people before undertaking to carry the Gospel to the foreign heathen. The world depression has contributed to strengthen this feeling. Missionaries, therefore, have hit upon the idea of demanding that the concessions given to Hindu Harijans should be given to their converts also. The implication, that the converts must continue to be classified as Harijans even after their baptism, that they must be assigned to the castes in which they were born and brought up before conversion, can not have escaped their attention. The receipt of grants for schools and colleges on condition that they restrict their Gospel of righteousness to spheres outside that of Government, was a comedown from the high pedestal of obeying a Divine mandate. The demand that the State should pay for the uplift of converts made without its request or consent, is a further descent which, in course of time, will deprive Missionaries of the last shred of justification for proselytisation. Professor Henry Elisha Allen in his book "The Turkish Transformation" which formed the subject of our article, "Turkey under Kamal Ataturk," in last week's Reformer, explains at length the reasons given by Turkish nationalists for disallowing foreign proselytising missions. They are applicable to every country in similar circumstances. We are glad that a non-proselytising agency to assist in social work is being planned under the auspices of the Society of Friends in England. We publish an outline of the scheme by Mr. Earnest Champness under the heading "An Indian Adult School Movement" in another column.

The Raza Ali—Ponnu Sammy Marriage:—The explanation of Sir Raza Ali that his marriage with Miss Ponnu V. Sammy of Kimberley involves no religious conversion, that his wife retains her own religion and property rights, should dispel the objections felt on the first receipt of the news and satisfy every reasonable person that there is no cause for criticism of the conduct of the Indian Agent General in the South African Union, who has acted with perfect propriety. Miss Sammy, now Lady Raza Ali, is presumably a major and is quite able to judge for herself. The marriage is contracted under the Union Statute. Sir Raza Ali holds that Indians in South Africa are citizens of the Union and he as a resident in the Union, though temporarily, is subject to the same laws. His claim that his marriage with a South African Indian girl, forms a fresh link between India and South Africa is not a vain one. The bride was given away by Sir P. Oppenheimer who held a reception subsequently in honour of the couple. The first two Agents left their wives at home in India, which was rather a handicap to them in their main task of establishing social relations with the South African community. Sir Maharaj Singh had a valuable co-adjutor in Lady Maharaj Singh and was able to advance the cause of good fellowship to a larger extent between Indians and South Africans. Syed Sir Raza Ali has done even better. He has found a partner in his work in South Africa as well as in life in that country itself. We trust that the Indian community there, will get over its excitement and co-operate with the Agent General and Lady Raza Ali in working for the removal of its disabilities in what, to most of its members, is their motherland.

Jan. 25

H. M. THE LATE KING.

"The King's life is drawing peacefully to a close." In these finely chosen words, the world was advised on Monday evening to expect the death of King George V. The end came in a few hours. The King breathed his last at about midnight the same day. The news has called forth tributes of sincere respect and admiration for the late King from all parts of the world. In India, it has been felt as a national calamity among all classes. To some extent, the warmth of feeling manifested on this occasion is directed to the monarchy which alone has survived the cataclysm which has overtaken most others in Europe, not only with undiminished but greatly enhanced prestige. To a very much larger extent, it is due to the late King's magnificent insight and courage in facing the extremely difficult problems with which he had to deal almost throughout his reign. For, though his end was peaceful, his lot was cast in stormy seas. "There had been no respite for him during the 25 years of his reign," said Mr. Baldwin in his feeling tribute broadcasted on Tuesday. "The whole world had been in a state of commotion and there never seemed to come a period when he could look ahead and feel all peace and quiet." His training as a sailor might have helped him but he had no other preparation for the position to which he was called, the throne of a world-wide Empire. When King Edward died, Mr. Asquith, then Prime Minister, wrote: "Now he has gone. His successor with all his fine and engaging qualities is without political experience. We were nearing the edge of a crisis almost without example in our constitutional history. What was the right thing to do?" This was the agitation over the Parliament Act limiting, the veto of the House of Lords. The King met the crisis in a manner which won the confidence of the country and the Empire. The Irish crisis followed. It is now known that it was King George's intervention which led to the abandonment of the policy of repression and the starting of the negotiations which led to the establishment of the Irish Free State. The Women's Suffrage troubles were another complication which caused anxiety in the first years of King George's reign. The Partition Agitation in India was finally closed by the personal intervention of His Majesty. The Coronation at Delhi was the King's own idea carried out in spite of shakings of the head by constitutional pandits. The incident on the Calcutta maidan when King George ordered his escort to fall back and allow the surging crowd to get a close view of Their Majesties, aroused popular enthusiasm to a high pitch and made the King's visit a great personal triumph. King George certainly understood the Indian problem better than many of his Ministers, and it is the general feeling that, if His Majesty had had a free hand in moulding Indian policy, the political situation in this country would have been very different. The King's death deprives India of a sovereign who understood her people and, within his constitutional limits, did his utmost to advance her to a position of equality with the self-governing Dominions. It is not a little due to his sympathy and goodwill that India, in spite of her obsolete system of Government, has grown to her present stature in national and international life. The Great War while it lasted was a fiery ordeal entailing much public as well as private sorrow to the late King. The cruel fate of the Tsar and his family, who were closely related by ties of blood and friendship to him, and the failure of his attempt to save them, must have been a heavy blow. But His Majesty did not allow this and other personal sorrows to interfere with the discharge of his public duties in every meticulous particular. Kingship in a constitutional government, some people think, is a sinecure. Of course, it can be a sinecure, if the King happens to be a non-entity. In that case, however, it will not last long. A constitutional sovereign has an important function in a democracy. He gives continuity and permanence to national life, he preserves values and traditions without which life for nations and individuals will be a daily gamble. No appreciation of the personality and reign of the late King would be adequate without reference to the large share of Her Majesty Queen Mary has had in them. A King without a Queen, the saying goes, is only half a King. To Queen Mary by his side it is due that King George V was the most complete King of our time. In India, certainly, Her Majesty, by her unfeigned interest in and appreciation of ideals of womanhood, created a new bond of understanding transcending differences of race and creed. His late Majesty has publicly acknowledged the great support she has been to him as a companion and counsellor in his lofty but lonely position. Though the Queen of a world Empire, she has all the virtues which good women all over the world possess. In a sketch of Queen Mary in an American journal, there was a good humoured reference to her care and frugality in the management of her household. Her Majesty, it was said, made sure that the lights in the Palace were switched off before she retired for the night. His Indian subjects join wholeheartedly in the prayer that the reign of their new sovereign, King Edward VIII, may be long and prosperous.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER BOMBAY, January 25, 1936.

INDIA AT THE NAVAL CONFERENCE.

A Reuter's message dated the 15th January announced the withdrawal of Japanese delegation from the Naval Conference and added: "It is understood that the Indian delegation regarded the arguments against the Japanese proposal for a common upper limit as overwhelming and shared the hope of other delegations that they would have the collaboration of the Japanese in seeking an alternative solution." This is the first mention of the participation of an Indian delegation in the Naval Conference. Had Reuter not been considerate enough to add that India's attitude at the Naval Conference was expressed by Mr. R. A. Butler, Under Secretary of State for India, the impression would have gone forth that Indian public opinion was overwhelmingly against conceding the demand of Japan for a common upper limit with Great Britain and the United States. Mr. Butler is a party politician and, as Under Secretary of State for India, he was bound to support the attitude of the British Government. In fact, the attitude of the Indian Government in such matters is necessarily that of the British Government and it is disingenuous to call it the Indian attitude. We do not, indeed, see why India should be dragged into the quarrel which concerns Great Britain and the United States. Having agreed upon naval parity between themselves, they insist on Japan agreeing to a lower standard. The British argument for superiority over Japan, as set forth by the British delegate, Lord Monsell, was: "A Power with world wide responsibilities must devote its naval forces to protect the communications between its various parts and must have forces far in excess of those of any Power able to maintain its whole force in home waters." The naval "responsibilities" of the British Power arise directly out of the policy of Australia and Canada of excluding the Japanese as a coloured race from their sparsely peopled territories, a policy which every thinking man must condemn as an exhibition of sheer race prejudice. If Great Britain dared tell these two Dominions that she can not undertake to support them in maintaining their irrational, dog-in-the manger policy, her "responsibilities" would at once diminish considerably. If Britain is afraid to do so, it is unfair and humiliating to India to make out that she approves of Britain maintaining a big navy in order to defend her two Dominions from risks which are directly due to their offensive and insensate policy of excluding coloured races from their territories. The argument of world-wide responsibilities as applied to the United States event is more flimsy. That country is a large, compact area and does not require a large Navy to protect communications with distant Dominions. She has even less need to move her warships beyond home waters than Japan. She has no doubt a longer coast line but she has no powerful military neighbours to fear. She is "cock of the walk" in her Continent. We have seen it said that American philanthropic and missionary institutions constitute a special interest which needs to be protected. If these institutions are appreciated in the countries in which they operate, no danger need be apprehended for their safety. If they are there against the wishes of the people, they have obviously no business to be there and should be withdrawn. Japan's international commerce is as world-wide as Britain's and America's and she has as much right to protect her trade routes as these Powers. Over and above these, there is the European sentiment that coloured races exist to be exploited by them, and that is a standing menace to Japan.

The case for Japan was stated clearly and temperately in an article by Baron Reijiro Wakatsuki in the July number of the American quarterly, Foreign Affairs. The Baron was Japan's chief Naval delegate at the London Conference of 1930 and twice Prime Minister of the Island Empire. He explained the circumstances in which he was obliged reluctantly to agree to the ratio of 5-5-3 fixed at the London Conference. At the same time, he made it clear in a written statement that the London Agreement was not to serve as a precedent in any subsequent Naval Conference and that at the next Conference which was to meet in five years, the Powers should reconsider the whole question of ratios on a new basis. Contrasting the position of Japan with that of the United States, the Baron wrote: "Ours is a country consisting of many small islands, overcrowded and so poor in natural resources that we must largely depend on imports for our supply of raw materials. The neighbours with whom you (the United States) may have troubles are either small militarily or quite impotent. On the contrary we are face to face with two great continental Powers—China with an area sixteen times as large as ours and a population of four hundred millions, and the Soviet Union with an area thirty times as large as ours and a population of one hundred and sixty millions. Moreover, these two countries, by reason of the exceptional conditions prevailing in them, have been sources of constant anxiety to Japan." Admiral Kichisaburo Nomura had explained in the same journal in January, 1935, what Japan wants and why. He wrote: "Japan has become finally convinced that so long as she suffers from the stigma of 5:5:3 ratio, she cannot fulfil her mission of preserving order and peace in the Far East. This ratio must be abolished and Japan granted a position of equality with other Powers. Having once gained that status, Japan would then be content with the minimum of armaments adequate to guarantee her national security in the light of domestic and external circumstances. But to have an inferior ratio dictated to us by other Powers, that is resented just as strongly as the continued enjoyment of extra-territorial rights by foreigners was opposed by the Japanese in the early years of Meiji. What Japan ardently desires in the matter of national defence is the recognition of the principle of equal opportunity, and the right, within the scope of that principle, to freely provide herself with such arms as she may deem necessary to secure her defence. This is an aspiration with which India can not but entirely sympathise. Mr. Butler's "overwhelming" reasons against it, are not shared by the people of India. In the United States an influential body of opinion recognises the peculiar position of Japan and is far from disposed to dismiss her claim as mere military madness. If the claim to equality had been conceded, the Naval Conference need not have been broken up. Japan was prepared to discuss limitation of armaments on the basis of equality. In the Peace Conference at Versailles she was obliged to drop her claim to racial equality. Her nationals are regarded as undesirable and are not allowed to enter the British Dominions and the United States on the same footing as Europeans. She is now denied her right to equality in the vital question of Defence. How can India support this continued provocation to a proud and sensitive sister Asiatic nation!

Shapurji Saklatvala—The one word which comes up with the name of Shapurji Saklatvala, whose death from heart failure occurred the other day, is 'indomitable'. His was indeed an indomitable spirit. The first time this writer met him, he was a cripple wheeling himself about in an invalid's chair in Esplanade House. But his physical incapacity did not quench his mental alertness. He was posing questions to every one whom he came across. A great friend of the Jesuit Fathers of St. Xavier's College from where he took his degree, it was whispered among his friends that he might one day become a Catholic. But this he did not and he remained in the faith of his forefathers to the end of his days. The only effect of his education under Catholic auspices perceptible was a somewhat fanatical faith in the infallibility of his own judgment. Favourite nephew of Jamshedji Tata, he had the independence of his great uncle without his toleration for other people's feelings and sentiments. This, however, is a small failing compared to the sturdy faith in himself which led him resolutely to turn his back on the prosperous and successful career—as the world counts success—which would assuredly have been his had he agreed to compromise with his convictions. Riches and honours would have come to him as a matter of course and his days would have passed in ease and comfort. But he deliberately chose for himself the hard path of the pioneer. Not for him the cushion and the slipper, not for him the tame enjoyments of the man born to prosperity. His ambitions were pitched higher. The career of a captain of industry in Bombay, had no attractions for him. He had seen it from behind the scenes and it had failed to attract him. Perhaps, it actually repelled him. However that may be, he left a safe harbour to launch his boat on the most tempestuous seas of our time. It was a hard and bitter struggle. He won the confidence of a British electorate and for a brief session he sat in the House of Commons as the sole Indian member. But his gifts were not those of a Parliamentarian. Besides, the prejudice against him as a Indian and a communist, was too strong to allow of his making his mark in Parliament. He married an Englishwoman and brought up his children in the same passionate hatred of oppression and wrong as fired his own breast. Was his life a success or was it a failure? The answer must depend on the values which each one cherishes. But there can be no two opinions about the value of such lives as Saklatvala's to human progress. They are the salt of the earth and but for them humanity would have remained much where it was in its nomad days.

WOMAN UNDER THE BUDDHIST LAW.

(BY MANEKJAL VAKIL.)

Buddhism is the most ethical of religions when applied to every day life in practice. It lays great emphasis on the eight-fold path of (1) right understanding, (2) right mindedness, (3) right speech, (4) right action, (5) right livelihood, (6) right endeavour, (7) right concentration, and (8) right re-collectedness. The emphasis on the supremely righteous character of the mode of life in these eight directions, i. e., socially and scientifically correct mode of life makes the religion practical and the mode of life elastic and dependent upon the knowledge of the individual to make him realise the correctness or incorrectness of his mode of life. Buddha laid great emphasis on this and on the capabilities of every man to work out his own salvation independent of gods and priests and rituals.

Marriage among Burman Buddhists have lost every religious character it might have had and at the present day it is purely a civil and consensual contract. Buddhist priests keep entirely aloof from such worldly affairs. No ceremony is necessary today for the validity of any marriage between two Burman Buddhists. Living together openly as husband and wife is presumptive evidence of marriage though in practice no marriage is contracted without some sort of show or the commonest form of entertainment of a tea party or without the knowledge of the people of the locality where the parties reside. Except in the case of widows or divorcees a girl under twenty years of age cannot contract a valid marriage without the consent, either expressed or implied, of her parents or guardians. But in the case of widows or divorcees the previous marriage had emancipated a girl from her parental control for the purpose of selecting a new husband.

A husband may marry a second wife during the continuance of the first wife though the wife is not permitted a similar right. But in practice the Buddhist law also contemplates the existence of other women of inferior standing who are described as inferior or lesser wives and are entitled to inherit the husband's properties along with the superior wives though receiving a smaller share. The Buddhist law speaks of wives and concubines. The word "mistress" of Western Europe cannot be used correctly in describing a lesser wife as the latter enjoys a higher status under the Buddhist law.

A marriage operates to create an impartible and joint interest, during the subsistence of a marriage, in all the "joint" properties of the couple, each keeping his or her own property at marriage as "separate" property. Lettefwa or joint property means all property acquired or inherited since marriage and includes profits or interest arising since marriage from the employment or investment of the separate property of either. In the case of the payin property and the property acquired or inherited by only one of the two during their coverture the party who brought it to the union has a two-thirds interest and the other party a one-third interest, while in the case of all other joint property each party has a one-half interest. If a Burman Buddhist male takes a second wife during the lifetime of the first, the second wife would seem to get her share of the interest in the estate of the husband alone subsisting at the time of the second marriage, while in the property jointly acquired during the second coverture all the three would get an equal share.

In the case of a divorce either by mutual consent or by reason of one of the parties contracting leprosy the joint property is divided in the above ratio, but in the case of a divorce effected automatically by desertion, the deserting party forfeits his or her interest in the joint property, but remains liable for the payment of all the joint debts. If the divorce is the result of adultery by the wife or adultery coupled with cruelty by the husband, the party at fault forfeits his or her interest in the joint property but remains liable for the payment of all debts, provided that where both the parties have already been married more than once, each party takes back his or her separate property. Where divorce is effected on account of the husband remaining in priesthood for seven or more days against the wishes of his wife, the wife is entitled to all the joint property and is also liable for the payment of all the joint debts.

Neither the husband nor the wife during coverture can act independently of each other to convey any joint property by way of sale, mortgage or gift. The joint property is however liable for the debts contracted and liabilities incurred by one party on behalf of the other party with the consent and knowledge, either express or implied, of the other party, as for instance in the case of ordinary trade or business usually carried on by either party and therefore to the implied knowledge of the other party.

Buddhist law recognises adoption though Buddhist religion says nothing about it. Adoption is thus merely in the nature of a contract and a minor cannot therefore adopt, nor give a child in adoption. Adoption may be for the purposes of inheritance or it may be an adoption out of pity not conferring rights of an heir. A second adoption during the life of the first adopted child is not prohibited. A woman can adopt a child to herself and children of both sexes can be adopted. A child may be adopted even though one may have one's own child. Even the adoption of adults is permissible. At the time of any partition and divorce it is the will of the parents which child should inherit from either in future, but on the attainment of the age of discretion it is the conduct of the child which determines whether it should inherit the estate of the parent it has not followed. Ordinarily at the time of divorce the parties by mutual consent may arrange about the custody of the children in any way they please. Generally the husband is entitled to the custody of sons and the wife to that of the daughters as also of very young sons. In the case of divorce on account of the specified legal faults of a husband or wife the innocent spouse gets all the properties of the couple and also the custody of the children, but if the children are sufficiently grown up to form an intelligent preference, their choice is not easily disregarded by a court of justice.

Under the Buddhist law no one can make a will or gift to take effect after his death though one may make a valid nomination under the Provident Funds Act. A Buddhist, however, may arrange before his death with all his heirs with their consent a division of all his property on his death so as to prevent any disputes later on.

Women have the same rights of inheritance as men under the Buddhist law. A wife or a husband takes the entire property of the other if there is no child of the union and gets a three fourths share of the estate if there is major eldest son or daughter who has the privileged position of getting one-fourth of the estate along with parent. The eldest daughter is the privileged child of the mother and the eldest son is the privileged child of the father. After the death of both the parents, both sons and daughters get an equal share and so also other male and female relatives of the same degree inheriting together.

The above is a brief statement of the present Buddhist law as administered in Burma by the British Burmese courts. There are, however, local or tribal variations in some of these rules due to earlier and ancient customs prevailing in certain localities or communities.

It will be thus seen that woman is treated in every way as an equal partner with the husband all throughout life and even after death regarding joint property except that the husband can marry more than one wife at the same time. A law for monogamy is however being discussed in Burma for some years and a Bill was brought in 1925 in the Burmese Legislative Chamber. The instances of two wives can happen only with the richer class of husbands as in the case of any other community where polygamy on the part of the husband is permissible. It is often remarked that the status of women determines the degree of civilisation and culture in a society or nation. This can only be subject to the degree of economic and industrial development that may have been reached in a given country. The equal status between man and woman under Buddhism has been in existence for centuries in the Buddhist countries of Burma, Indo-China, China, Japan and Ceylon though they were not industrially far advanced for want of mechanical transport and factories. Under favourable economic conditions they would progress at a much more rapid rate as in the case of Japan and can assimilate the socialist plan of production and exchange more rapidly. Even in socialist Russia of to-day the marriage laws have practically adjusted themselves from the Christian to the Buddhist code which has already been in existence for centuries elsewhere, though there is no property in modern Russia to inherit from the spouse or the parents except personal effects as all means of production are owned by the nation as a whole.

THE HINDUSTANI ACADEMY*

(SACHCHIDANANDA SINHA.)

I am profoundly grateful to you for the honour you have done me by electing me President of the Conference of the Hindustani Academy. If I may say so your choice of me as President is justifiable on this ground only that I am one of those who believe that Hindustani has within it the potentiality of becoming, in the fulness of time, not only the lingua franca of this great country, to a much larger extent than is likely to be the case with either of its two highly artificial literary forms, popularly known as Hindi and Urdu, but also of producing a literature, both learned and popular, to serve the needs of all classes. I shall revert to this subject later. I may be permitted to add that by your electing me President, you have formally recognised that Bihar, the province of my birth is one of the great units in the future linguistic federation of India and, for this recognition, I tender to you my sincerest thanks. In my humble opinion, a linguistic federation of India, with Hindustani as its lingua franca, is no less important than the administrative federation of our country which is going to be inaugurated under the new Reforms.

The Hindustani Academy, under the auspices of which we are meeting to-day, was established under a resolution of the Government of Agra and Oudh, dated January, 22, 1927, and the institution was formally inaugurated, at Lucknow, on the 29th March of the same year, by His Excellency Sir William Marris, the then Governor of these provinces. It is to me a matter of great gratification to recall that the Academy owes its existence to the interest and enthusiasm in the languages and literatures of the principal vernaculars of Upper India on the part of my esteemed friend, the Hon. Rai Rajeshwar Bali, the then Minister of Education in Agra and Oudh. The Academy started its career with an annual grant of Rs. 50,000 from the local Government, but that amount has had to be substantially reduced, to our regret, owing to financial stringency. It has naturally entailed the curtailment of the work of the Academy. I earnestly hope that, with the setting in of better times, it will be possible for the Ministry of Education to secure the restoration of the original grant, the diminution of which, I am sure, the local Government regret as much as do the members of the Hindustani Academy.

So far as I am aware, no other province in British India has any institution corresponding exactly to the Hindustani Academy of these provinces. As the establishment of this institution came about in pursuance of a clearly expressed desire on the part of the local legislative council, a similar attempt was made in Bihar and Orissa, some time later, to get the Government of that province to inaugurate literary Academies—one at Patna, and the other at Cuttack. The resolution was accepted by the Government of that province and in pursuance of it, the then Education Minister (the late Sir Muhammed Fakhruddin) appointed a representative committee under the presidentship of the late Sir Sayed Ali Imam to work out a scheme for the establishment of literary academies in Bihar and Orissa. More than one member of this Academy was nominated a member of the Bihar and Orissa Committee and in the end, Sir Ali Imam was able to submit a report embodying a scheme which, in my opinion, was reasonable and practicable. But as the Bihar and Orissa Government found itself by that time faced with serious financial stringency, the report was shelved, and the proposal has not been revived since.

* Presidential address to third Conference, Allahabad, 12th January.

either by the non-official members of the legislative council or by the Ministry of Education in that province. This to me is a matter of deep regret, and I venture to hope that it may be possible for Bihar to have before long a Hindustani Academy of its own. Perhaps, the separation of Orissa and its constitution into a separate administrative unit, in the near future, might lighten the burdens of the future Bihar Government and enable them to start a Hindustani Academy, at Patna, corresponding to the one we have for these provinces, at Allahabad.

This institution has now been in existence for nearly eight years, and, in my opinion, it has placed to its credit good work in carrying out many of the objects for which it was founded. The record of its work is to be found in its annual reports but, if I may suggest it to our General Secretary, Dr. Tara Chand, it would be as well if he could bring out a short compendious report on the working of this institution during the last eight years of its existence. So far as I can gather from a perusal of the annual reports, 27 original and translated works have been published, till now, by the Academy, in Hindi, and 19 in Urdu. Many of the original works are of great merit, while the translations and compilations are highly useful publications. Apart from publishing books, the Academy organised from the time of its establishment, till 1933, courses of lectures by eminent scholars, six in Urdu and six in Hindi. These lectures—some, if not all, of which have been issued both as originally delivered, and also in translation from Urdu into Hindi and vice versa—were a notable feature of the work of the Academy, but I find, to my great regret, that they had to be dropped from 1934 onwards, very probably, for want of funds as the Government grant was substantially reduced.

The next item on the programme of our work is the awarding of prizes for books of merit in Hindi and Urdu, both to authors of distinction and also to deserving students of the Universities. Here, again, our record is by no means unworthy of our position as the only literary Academy in the whole of India, since as much as Rs. 8,000 has been awarded to authors of meritorious works, in both the literary idioms, while Rs. 800 has been given away in prizes to bona fide students of the Universities with a view to encourage them in the production of good books in Hindi and Urdu. I have not the least doubt that by awarding these prizes, to the amount of nearly Rs. 9,000, the Academy has rendered a valuable service to the growth and development of vernacular literatures in Upper India.

The Hindustani—the quarterly journal of the Academy in Hindi and Urdu—has sought to give publication to informing articles on serious subjects and has maintained a high standard of scholarship. Apart, however, from these tangible achievements, the existence of the Hindustani Academy has tended to produce results which cannot be assessed so directly, but which will find expression in the course of time. By the introduction of scientific and literary works among the Hindustani speaking people, it exercises an influence upon the mass mind which must produce, in the long run, beneficial results. Also, by bringing writers of Hindi and Urdu together, in the same organisation, and attempting to simplify these languages, it tends to bridge the gulf the existence of which is both a literary and civic danger. Lastly through the work of its committees for giving literary advice, and by awarding of prizes it exercises a wholesome influence over literary production and raises the standard of literature in the vernaculars.

I have felt justified in taking up your time in reviewing briefly the nature of our activities, and the creditable work done since the foundation of this Academy, because I have found, even in these provinces, a great deal of ignorance about these matters. As one of the objects of a Conference like ours is, amongst other things, to educate public opinion, I have thought it desirable to survey briefly its work activities since the establishment of this Academy, so that the public—and also the local Government—may have before them a clear conspectus of the work which it has achieved during the first eight years of existence. So far, this institution has depended mainly on Government grant, and on the small income it has derived from the sale of its publications. There is no reason, however, why it should not now attempt to make an appeal to the public at large for contributions and donations for carrying on its work. If such an appeal be made, I have no doubt that the numerous lovers of Hindi and Urdu literatures will generously respond to it. At any rate, the experiment is worth trying.

In this connection, I may also be permitted to state that it seems to me essential that there should be an annual conference held under the auspices of the Academy—preferably at different important places in these provinces, and even outside its boundaries in the Hindustani-speaking areas, if possible, to enable scholars and all others interested in the development of Upper Indian vernacular literatures to meet, discuss and compare notes on the many problems connected with the objects and the work of the Academy. I am glad to find that this suggestion has been editorially supported by the new Hindi magazine, the Hansa of Bombay, in its December issue. If my recollection serves me right the last Conference of the Hindustani Academy was held so far back as 1932, nearly four years ago. This is surely too long an interval. In my opinion, we should make it a rule hereafter to hold an annual session of our Conference. Probably, our executive have not been able to organise any session till now since we last met, owing to their crippled resources. If so, it is an additional reason why we should constantly keep before the local Government and the public our needs and requirements, so that we may be able to carry on our work in future more efficiently, with the aid of generous donors interested in the cause we stand for.

MAHARAJA GAEKWAR'S DIAMOND JUBILEE CELEBRATION IN NEW YORK.

(FROM A CORRESPONDENT.)

For the first time in history, a Hindu ruler's sixty years of sovereignty over a kingdom in India was celebrated by Americans of all faiths. His Highness the Maharaja Gaekwar of Baroda is the International President of the World Fellowship of Faiths which held this unprecedented celebration on Thursday evening, the second of January in the Grand Ballroom of the Hotel New Yorker, New York City.

Dr. Alban G. Widgery of England, who was in the service of the Maharaja Gaekwar for over seven years in India, described His Highness' tireless labor in behalf of his people and especially emphasized his establishment of compulsory free education for all of his two and a half million subjects.

Sri Deva Ram Sukul, a Brahmin teacher of India, exhibited special pictures of the Maharaja and of Baroda and other Indian States. Mirza Ahmad Sohrab of Persia, discussed India's contributions to world civilization as exemplified in the benevolent and progressive rule of the Maharaja Gaekwar. Rabbi B. Leon Hurwitz, Chairman of the Brooklyn Council of the World Fellowship of Faiths, spoke especially of the fact that His Highness came to Chicago in 1933 to deliver the keynote address, "Religion in a Changing World", which opens the recently published book "World Fellowship", that contains the 242 addresses delivered by 199 spokesmen of all faiths, races and countries in 83 meetings held by the World Fellowship of Faiths during Chicago's Century of Progress World's Fair.

Kedarnath Das Gupta General Executive of the World Fellowship of Faiths, recounted his several interviews with His Highness last Summer at the latter's English residence, "Aldsworth", former home of Lord Tennyson. When Mr. Das Gupta was expressing his appreciation of the Maharaja Gaekwar's great achievements, His Highness said, "Don't tell me what I have done. Tell me what I can do now."

The Rev. Jabez T. Sunderland, D.D., who has worked for many years on behalf of Indian progress, sent a special message which was read to the assembly. Sir Francis Young-husband, K. C. S. I., K. C. I. E., Chairman of the British National Council of the World Fellowship of Faiths, wrote expressing his appreciation of the great improvement effected in the State of Baroda under the leadership of His Highness since Sir Francis first visited Baroda more than fifty years ago. Lord Lamington, former Governor of Bombay, now a member of the British National Council of the World Fellowship of Faiths expressed his appreciation of the Maharaja Gaekwar in a message which was also read to the assembly.

Bhupesh Guha of India opened the meeting by playing Hindu music on the esraj and on the bansi. Charles Frederick Weller, General Executive of the World Fellowship of Faiths presided.

The text of message read from Sir Francis Young-husband is as follows:—His Highness the Maharaja Gaekwar of Baroda is one of the great Princes of India who have devoted most earnest attention to the advancement of the peoples committed to their charge. For sixty years he has ruled Baroda; and Baroda today is a very different State from what it was when I first visited it fifty-three years ago. The people are better educated, they live under better material conditions, and they are happier. And this has been accomplished through the Maharaja keeping firm to the old Hindu traditions yet being open to effect any necessary modern improvements and all the time being sympathetic with the feelings and ideas of adherents of other Faiths than his own.

"May his rule extend to many years yet."

A GREAT INDIAN RULER.

BY JABEZ T. SUNDERLAND.

I know of no modern ruler who seems to me worthy of more honour than His Highness, the Maharaja Gaekwar of Baroda, the Diamond Jubilee or sixtieth anniversary of whose reign occurs in January, 1936. Not only has his reign been long but concerning the conditions under which it has existed, its achievements have been remarkable. From his earliest manhood he has been a reformer in his very blood. He has been large-minded. He has been forward-looking. He has shown himself a born leader. He has lived not for himself alone or primarily, but for his State and his People.

He has had the handicap of being under the control of a Power that has been suspicious of him, lest he do too much in the way of educating and enlightening his people. Nevertheless, he has persistently dared to lead his State forward to the very extremest limits of freedom, progress, enlightenment and independence possible in his circumstances. While in British India the Government has not faced the vital problem of universal education, with the consequence that an appalling illiteracy is still seen there, the courageous ruler of Baroda has created in his state universal compulsory education for both sexes, with the result that illiteracy there has been almost wiped out.

Nor has he stopped with this great achievement. He has made much provision for all the more important kinds of higher advanced education. He has waged constant war against the scourge of "untouchability" and has done much to mitigate the evils of caste. Besides providing liberal education for women, he has legislated and in various other ways planned to give them a freer and larger life. He has been steadily active in promoting agricultural and industrial improvements, public sanitation and hygiene, creating hospitals and providing enlightened medical service for all classes of the people. With all the rest, he has given his influence steadily against religious superstitions and in favour of religious intelligence, breadth and progress, in support of social reforms, and, so far as permitted, in promotion of political reforms.

Several other rulers of Indian States have advanced far in the directions in which he has moved, following in his footsteps; but he has been the leader, and deserves the honour as such.

The contrast in all those respects which we see between his rule and that of British India is a great honor to him and India.

Writing as I do in America, I take especial pleasure in calling attention to certain important activities of His Highness, in which he has associated himself with us. We have in this country (or in this country and England) an organization called, The World Federation of Faiths, created by two distinguished workers for the promotion of international, interracial and interreligious goodwill and brotherhood,—one an Indian, Mr. Kedar Nath Das Gupta, and the other an American, Mr. Charles Francis Weller. In connection with the recent Century of Progress Exposition in Chicago, this organization, under the vigorous leadership of these two men, held a great Parliament of Religions, lasting two weeks, with eighty-three notable meetings addressed by one hundred ninety-nine speakers, from nearly all the important countries of the world and representing all the world's important religions. At this great Parliament of Religions, His Highness was the Honorary President and gave the opening address. In July, 1936, a second similar great Parliament is to be held for two weeks in London and Oxford, in which he is to have an active and influential part. He is also the President of the International Council of The World's Fellowship of Faiths which has general supervision over these Parliaments and other activities.

His Highness has made several visits to America in past years, and is well known and highly esteemed here. Plans are made to celebrate his Diamond Jubilee in New York, by a public gathering in the Grand Ball Room of the Hotel New Yorker on January 2, 1936, and by a Banquet at the Hotel Baltimore on January 28, with distinguished speakers at both occasions.

Lovers of humanity and believers in human freedom not only in India and America but in all lands, may well unite in celebrating the Diamond Jubilee of such a ruler and such a man. He belongs to the world. Civilization is more secure and all nations are richer because of him.

SOCIAL WORK IN NAZI GERMANY.

(BY A CORRESPONDENT.)

"GOOD LIGHTING—GOOD WORK."

One of the many tasks which the "Beauty of Work" section, of the German Labour Front is grappling with is the matter of correct lighting in factory and office. With the assistance of the German Technical Light Society, the Work Community for Promoting the Electrical Trade and the State Supervisory Board, it is planning to canvass for betterment by means of a "Good Lighting—Good Work" week between October 21st and November 2nd. The aim is to enlighten the general public as to the importance of correct illumination on the working capacity and working incentive of the individual and no less on the earning capacity of the enterprise. Lectures and window displays, cinemas and street placarding are to illustrate the right and the wrong way of lighting. Area experts of the "Beauty of Work" organization, armed with the necessary apparatus for light registration, will patrol the working sites and indicate possible corrections or improvements. They will be assisted by officials from the State Trade Supervisory Board. The yearly reports of the latter officials indicate how called for such enlightenment is in the increasing number of complaints received as to inadequate lighting. Defective lighting was recorded in 2843 cases in 1932, 2976 in 1933 and 3631 in 1934. For lack of sufficient officials the Trade Supervisory Board is in no position to inspect even half the number of offices and will, therefore, never be able to remedy matters of its own accord. Hence co-operation is being solicited in this way from individual enterprises by the present publicity campaign purposing to bring home to employers and employees alike the greater advantage of suitable lighting.

ENCOURAGEMENT OF LARGER FAMILIES.

Two new measures have been added to those introduced by the National Socialist Government of Germany to encourage marriage and procreation. One of these is an arrangement by which the redemption of marriage loans which have been granted to many thousands of couples since 1932 is made easier and the other consists of special tax reductions and a child bonus for large families. Both measures are intended to make it easier for people with several children and to encourage larger families. The results of the marriage loan scheme and the Bill for Furtherance of Marriage passed in 1933 have been satisfactory. In the last two years 500,000 girls have benefitted by a State loan up to 1,000 Reichsmark on marrying. This has not only led to a rise in the number of marriages (in 1934 there were 230,000 of about 40 % more marriages than in 1932) but also two thousands of vacancies on the labour market. Marriage loans are only given on condition that the girl undertakes to give up her job and not take another. The loans are free of interest and the rate of redemption is 1%. At the birth of every child 25 % of the sum to be repaid is cancelled. During the two past years 2,208,000 couples have had children. Now regulations governing repayment have been greatly improved. The rate of redemption is no longer 1 % of the original loan but 1 percent of the remainder after the remission for children has been deducted. At the birth of every child parents will in future be granted the following facilities:—

- (1) a remission of one quarter of the original loan,
- (2) suspension from repayment for one year,
- (3) a reduction in the rate of redemption on resumption of payments.

In 1934 there were 218,000 more births in Germany than in 1933. 145,000 or more than half were born by mothers who had married on the state loan. But even numerous marriages and a general eagerness to have children are going to be of little avail in the long run unless provision is made that the children will grow up under tolerable conditions. There are still a large number of people, especially those with six children or more, who do not possess enough beds or bedclothes. The Reich Government has, therefore, decided to dedicate 2½ to 3 millions of the marriage loan fund to a Children's Bonus. Before Christmas about 300,000 children under sixteen years of age belonging to poor, large families are to be made an allowance of about 400 Reichsmark. A large family is one with four or more children. The allowance will be a gift and is not to be repaid. This scheme will be continued in the future so that 6,000 to 10,000 children will be receiving a bonus averaging 400 Reichsmark. This "Children's Bonus" is the latest step in the population policy which has been pursued by the Third Reich ever since 1933. At first income tax was assessed according to the size of the family; then fathers of large families were given preference in applying for vacant posts and now on October 1, this arrangement for giving direct help to the parents of many children will begin. This new measure may be termed the first step in an equalization of the family burden as announced for the near future by Dr. Gutt, Chief of the Population Department in the Reich Home Office. A Reich Family Compensation Fund has been planned for the benefit of all office and factory workers with small incomes.

MARRIAGE LOANS AND THE BIRTH-RATE.

The granting of Reich loans to encourage marriage which began in August 1933 was originally intended as a supplementary measure for reducing unemployment but in the course of the last two years it has proved a most effective means of raising the birthrate. Dusseldorf is the first German town to report that fertility in "subsidised" marriages was nearly 100 per cent. higher than in other marriages. This result confirms the opinion of Dr. Burgdorfer, Director of the Reich Statistical Office and one of the greatest authorities on population figures. According to the statistics there were 66 births for every 100 "subsidised" marriages from August 1933 to June 1934. Three-fifths, or 58 per cent. of the 1934 birth-rate increase is ascribed to marriages on the State loan.

MR. ELWIN'S CHRISTMAS MESSAGE.

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Dear Sir,

Perhaps it is worth while sending you a word on your paragraph about my Christmas message. I do not think it was in any way inconsistent with the attitude I have maintained for the last five years, which is that it is possible to be a true and convinced Christian and yet have the deepest respect for the religion of others and a policy of non-interference with them. That is the religious basis of the Gond Seva Mandal. On the great Mussalman festivals, our Mussalman brethren invite us to their houses and we share their joy; at Diwali our Ashram blazes with scores of tiny lamps; one of our brethren is a leading Gond priest, and himself generally conducts the Gond festivals, which personally I always enjoy immensely; and on Christmas Day, when some of our Christian (and not only Christian, Hindu and Parsi as well) friends send presents for our children, we keep the festival of the Holy Child who has taught us (as I said in my broadcast) that a thing has only to be human to be precious.

That sentence was the heart of my message. It is all too easy to serve the poor and outcasts with the idea of adding them to one's own community, or of making political capital out of them, or of simply finding in them some sphere of work for one's own energies. The ideal is that we should have a great love for all humanity simply because it is human. That is what Christmas has taught me to see Christ, to see Daridranarayan, in all who wear the human dress. I venture to think, therefore, that Christmas is specially the festival of the humanitarian workers: it speaks of poverty, of childhood, of mother-love, and—whatever the centuries may have made of it—of a universal human generosity. You say that ours was not a typical Indian Christmas—that of course is true. But why should it not be typical? How could the birthday of one who was himself a poor man, born under a cloud of suspicion and political oppression, be better spent than by trying to bring some joy to those who live on the frontiers of starvation?

You need not suspect that a purely geographical expression like 'the lonely places of the Empire' contains a confession of a new political philosophy.

If Mr. Elwin had stated in his broadcast that Hindu and Gond festivals were also celebrated at Karanjia, there would have been no occasion for our comment.—Ed. I. S. R.

CHRISTIAN MISSIONS AND HINDUS.

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

A learned Brahmin friend, who is also an M. Sc. of the Madras University, has just been telling me that, during his railway journey last week, his fellow passenger, a Seventh day Adventist European missionary, had unceremoniously told him that he should immediately become a Christian. Nothing I could tell my friend seemed to assuage his feelings of resentment towards "the missionary and his religion." With due diffidence, therefore, I venture to write the following for the consideration of those of your missionary readers who are engaged in evangelistic work in India:—

1. It was a Hindu who refused to enter Heaven, unless the stray dog which followed him, unbidden, was also admitted with him. Compare this with the indifference with which the Christian nations of Europe regard the sufferings of the Ethiopians whom they are morally bound to defend.

2. Buddha being one of the best products of Hinduism, "The Light of Asia" by Sir Edwin Arnold, may be read side by side with the New Testament, particularly St. John's Gospel.

3. No Christian should be allowed to preach outside his church, unless he holds a certificate of having passed an examination in Hinduism, the textbooks for which having been selected by a committee of learned missionaries and Hindus.

4. Sir Valentine Chirol wrote in 1910: "The social relations between the two races in India—itsself always a problem of infinite difficulty—have certainly not been improved by the large influx of a lower class of Europeans, which the development of railways and telegraphs and other industries requiring technical knowledge have brought in their train." ("Indian Unrest" p. 3). While the lower class Europeans have steadily increased since 1910, the better class Europeans have considerably decreased in India. The former are alike deficient in the knowledge of the Christian religion and the good manners of a corresponding class of Indians. They should be evangelised first and good manners taught them before the Gospel is preached any more to the Hindus. Failing this, Christianity will not get its deserved reception among the superior class of Indians.

5. I was once privileged to be present at an important Indian State function which ended with what corresponds to "Presentation at Court." Amid the gorgeous splendours of the durbar hall, the members of the religious order, some of them clad only in small loin-cloths, were the first to be presented to and receive presents from the Maharajah. Even the Crown Prince had to wait until the humblest representative of the religion had been greeted with the utmost reverence by the Maharajah. When these proceedings were in progress, the Christian Chief Justice of the Maharajah's High Court whispered to me: "Can you picture a scene like this anywhere in Europe?"

6. Every thinking Asiatic asks himself why the Christian religion, which, on bended knees, has blessed Europe's greatest lunatic during his march to commit wholesale murders of a defenceless people, should be propagated among the coloured races, notwithstanding his knowledge that Jesus Christ still reigns in the hearts of a large number of European Christians.

7. In one of my letters published long ago in The Examiner, the best exponent of the Catholic religion in India, I observed: "The antagonism with which the Catholics and Protestants, especially those who are engaged in religious work, treat one another in the Press, has retarded Christian work in this land as few other things could have done.....Is caste feeling among the Hindus so bitter as the feeling of mistrust and un-Christian sentiments in which the Catholic and Protestant missionaries regard one another? Are not their real or pretended aims of influencing the Hindu and the Mahomedan very considerably weakened by the absence of charity among themselves?" The Examiner, July 27, 1918.

8. "Do not speak of God to the multitude; the man worthy of God is God among men" is an Asiatic saying which I quoted in a letter published in the Times of India three years ago, in grateful appreciation of the life and labours of an English missionary whose death was announced in the paper.

I conclude this with the following story:—One morning in 1928, the English principal of a well known Missionary High School was shocked to learn that a small Hindu boy, son of a lawyer, had fainted in his class room as a result of some beating inflicted upon him during scripture lessons. When the boy began to revive, the principal had him conveyed to his father, with a letter of the most profound apology, and requesting him not to institute any legal proceedings. The Hindu father's reply came a few hours later, and the principal read it out to those who were with him, six other English people and myself. Thanking the principal, the writer said that taking any legal action was unthinkable to him, but that he could not help expressing surprise that the boy should have been cruelly treated in a Christian school while he was being taught the life of Jesus who was so partial to little children. One of the company observed, "Is not that Hindu gentlemen an exemplary Christian?"

M. G. JOSEPH.

The Editor,
The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir, Radha Krishnan's exposition of Hinduism, otherwise lucid and illuminating, becomes somewhat obscure, when it claims that it is quest after 'truth'—a term which in common parlance implies an element of certitude. So far as Hinduism is a 'quest' it is perfectly logical and what is significant in this connection is that even Gayatri purports to seek no more than 'Light'—which is also the Upanishadic yearning ('Thamaso' ma Jotirgamaya' Lead me from darkness to Light.)—implying perhaps the recognition of the concept that any religious experience worth the name, can never be finite to merit being called an ascertained truth for all time. In this view it will be less risky to define Hinduism as 'ceaseless quest and adventure on the part of man, with only the next step for a goal, leaving what further may break into view in the spiritual horizon to be sensed from the point reached by renewed endeavour, with the growing joyful expectation that new endless visions lie behind.' This must be more or less what the eminent Professor himself means, when he says that there is no finality so far as religious life and quest are concerned.

This must a fortiori be so, as it is being borne on our mind that even the material Universe is itself discovered to be endless both in variety and extent, receding farther and farther away eluding telescopes, larger both in power and size as they are directed against space.

With this for our premises, it would be interesting to explore and trace the highest pinnacle so far reached, in religious experience by man ever since his appearance and evolution commenced on earth.

Hindu religious literature has called this pinnacle 'Vaishnavajnanam' or Samadarsanam known in English as Cosmic Consciousness. This is explained to be the man's capacity to live in entire harmony with nature making her respond to him at every turn. This capacity in terms of human understanding is said to comprise the power of locomotion at will with the speed of mind and strength to overcome all obstacles howsoever formidable they may be, friendliness and fellowship with the entire creation of which what we call Universal Brotherhood must be a very poor fraction and supreme earthly bliss transcending all sex sense. This is what is exemplified in the life of Shuka to whom Sreemad Bhagavat is attributed. Sage Kapila in his discourse to his mother Devahooti stressed on the same point when he said:

"Napasamyam param bhutam Akartuh Samadarsanam." Sreemad Bhagavath III Canto, Chapter 29.

INDIAN ADULT SCHOOL MOVEMENT.

One of the chief debts of the Adult School Movement to the Society of Friends is the possession of an international-mindedness, which is a belief in man, irrespective of colour, race or nationality, based on a faith in the Spirit. Such a faith must seek to express itself in a practical way or lose its sense of reality.

It is obvious to any student of Indian affairs that there has been a deep estrangement between Indians and the British people. With the causes we are not now concerned, but we must ask if a large measure of reconciliation is not possible. Would an effort from these islands to help educational and social work in India carry with it a message of affection and reconciliation? I mean an effort which was obviously free from Imperialistic motives and was conducted in a spirit of appreciation of the best in Indian culture. Could we, in approaching Indians, show the conviction that we realised that we had to receive as well as to give of the deepest things of life? It is impossible to answer such questions in the abstract. The answers must come, if at all, from practical tests.

Much correspondence and many interviews during the last year and a half have produced evidence which, in my opinion, entitles one to say that the National Adult School Union, possibly in association with other bodies, could do an important piece of international service by helping to start an Adult School Movement in India.

The exact form that such an Indian Adult School Movement should take is for the moment of lesser importance than the spirit in which the enterprise is undertaken. The form of Adult School most suited to any district in India can only be determined in that land. Nevertheless, in order to facilitate discussion and investigation, a provisional scheme has been drawn up and submitted to many people capable of forming a judgment, and has met with much approval. This scheme in brief outline is as follows:

(1) "Study Adult Schools" should be established in the towns of India, in particular, where there is a College. The twofold purpose of such Study Adult Schools would be:

To create a passion for adult educational and social work, especially among students.

To study, among other things, the best methods by which such adult educational and social work could be carried out in the villages and towns of India.

For the use of Study Adult Schools, it is proposed to publish in India a special Adult School Handbook written in English.

(2) "People's Schools" should be formed in the villages and towns of India to carry out the ideals and methods, which have been considered by the study Adult School groups.

The preparation of the first Indian Handbook is proceeding rapidly. The aim is to have the majority of the lessons written by Indians. At the time of writing, twenty-two ladies and gentlemen have promised to write lessons for the Indian Handbook. These writers will deal with subjects of which they have a special knowledge. As planned, the articles may be divided into the following groups: Descriptions of educational and social experiments; Indian social and health matters; methods employed in adult education; the League of Nations and India.

Running through the Handbook, in sets of two—Indian and non-Indian—will be a series of biographical studies under the title of "Leaders and Thinkers." It is hoped that the consideration of the motives which have urged men and women to devote themselves to the good of their fellows will help to give the Indian Adult School Movement some sense of the underlying guidance of the Spirit of God.

A considerable amount of adult educational work is being done in India, and the National Adult School Union, in desiring to help such work, would, of course, seek to co-operate as closely as possible with existing societies. Some Indians are attracted to the formation of an Indian Adult School movement because, in their opinion, it might help to link up and unify much scattered and loosely-organised work. As far as I know, such unifying work is not being done on any large scale in India outside the Bombay Presidency.

NOTES

Gandhi-Sanger Dialogue:—Mr. Mahadev Desai writes a five column article in Harijan of the 25th January controverting Mrs. Margaret Sanger's versions of her interview with Gandhiji at Wardha on different occasions. He gives the correct renderings of what Gandhiji said, with his own elucidations of their significance. We have tried by excising passages which did not seem quite necessary to the narrative to bring the article within manageable limits for reproduction in the Reformer. The difference between Gandhiji and Mrs. Sanger is fundamental. Gandhiji regards the sexual act except as a means of procreation as self-indulgence. Animals copulate only to breed and man should not in this matter be capable of less self-restraint than a dog or a goat. Mrs. Sanger, on the other hand, holds that the sex act is itself a spiritual exercise and that procreation is an irrelevant and embarrassing consequence which can and should be cut out by means of chemicals or mechanical apparatus. As a matter of fact, we may be sure, neither Gandhiji nor Mrs. Sanger hold these extreme views into which they were driven by the ardour of their argumentation. Gandhiji certainly does not regard it as sinful to experience enjoyment in procreation; nor does Mrs. Sanger wish to give a charter to libertines of America and India. Gandhiji claimed that he knew thousands of his countrywomen, but we doubt if they have taken him into his confidence about their conjugal relations. To generalise from one's own case is neither safe nor reliable because one is apt either to underestimate or overestimate the part which volition played in bringing about the birth of a child. Mention is made in "Women in Soviet Russia" of a woman who declared that she would like to have twelve children, but each of them by a different husband! Few women in this country would tell Mrs. Sanger that they got a baby because they wanted one, although it might be the bare truth, as it would seem immodest. Mrs. Sanger may rest assured that the Indian wife is not such a helpless body as Western people are apt to think because she does not dance or try to forget herself in what is called society. Birth control can be beneficial in specific cases and should be made available in such cases.

Next Congress President:—It is now certain that Pandit Jawharlal Nehru will be elected President of the next session of the National Congress to be held in Lucknow. Its date has been postponed from March to April to suit his convenience. The Pandit, interviewed in London where he is on a short visit, spoke with greater freedom as regards the task before the Congress than he has permitted himself hitherto. An Indian Allied News message dated 27th January reported him as declaring in an interview with British and foreign journalists that the only question for Congress was how it should approach the matter of elections. A fuller version of the interview has been since issued by Reuter's Agency. The Pandit thought it highly probable that Congress would put up candidates in the elections. On the question of acceptance of office, the Pandit merely said that it would be one of the main questions for decision at Lucknow. He went on to say that his test for any constitution for India was how far economic questions, unemployment, education, health and questions relating to land tenure could be satisfactorily dealt with. "Under the New Constitution," he added, "you can not lift a little finger on these questions." That is also our view, though we may not see eye to eye with the Pandit as to the best way of dealing with some of the subjects mentioned by him. India is very much in arrears as regards social reform and the test of any constitution is how far it facilitates the adoption of measures for the amelioration of the conditions of life of the population. We do not expect any Party to take a different view. Where the difference comes in is as regards the possibility of advancing social legislation under the New Constitution. While we think with the Pandit that very little can be done under the New Constitution, we cannot ignore, as he does, the fact that a not inconsiderable section of our countrymen, practically the whole of the Muslim community, the Justice Party of non-Brahmins in Madras and their counterparts in Maharashtra, the "scheduled castes" who follow Dr. Ambedkar, and, after the recent Nagpur session of their Federation, the Liberals, believe that the New Constitution can be worked with benefit to the country and should be so worked. Therefore, it is our view that these groups should be given the opportunity of proving the correctness of their opinion and those of us who differ from them can best serve the country by standing aside, if we cannot support them in carrying through their beneficent measures. If, nevertheless, they fail in their endeavours, the New Constitution will have collapsed, and the time will come for devising a more acceptable constitution. We have much respect for Congress leaders as men of integrity and patriotism, but there are men outside that body also who are quite as honest and patriotic, and we feel that their opinions also are entitled to weight.

Congress Socialist:—In welcoming the Congress Socialist (Reformer 11) we confessed to some perplexity in understanding the significance of the double designation. Pandit Jawharlal Nehru seems to have anticipated the difficulty. In his message to the Socialist Conference, reprinted elsewhere, held at Meerut a few days ago, he has explained for himself the appropriateness of the double nomenclature. He is a Congressman because he wants political freedom and he is a Socialist because he wants social freedom. There are other freedoms, such as intellectual freedom, religious freedom, to mention only two. These too every body wants but apparently one need not start a party to work for them. Otherwise, we shall have Congress intellectualists, Congress religionists and so on. The Pandit, indeed, recognises that social freedom includes political freedom but in the political condition of dependence of India, he thinks a separate movement is called for. So far his position is clear though not scientific as he claims his socialism to be. The practical question, however, is how far are Socialists justified in collaborating for political freedom with a capitalist or bourgeois. The first Labour Government in Great Britain was supported and indeed placed in office by the bourgeois Liberals. The position was soon found to be intolerable and the Cabinet resigned. The second Labour Government split on this question, the majority going into opposition and a small minority remaining and becoming part of the National Government. Politics nowadays is largely based on economics. In fact, the new nationalism is economic nationalism. The solution which would suggest itself to a socialist for a given economic question will be in the nature of things different from that which would commend itself to a believer in the present system of which private property is the cornerstone. The large majority of Congressmen have not renounced private property and a small minority are wealthy men. This may be said even of socialists. It is, perhaps, this which does not make the co-operation between the two crucial enough, at this stage, to call for a definite treatment in the Pandit's message.

A Reading Reminiscence:—Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru has supplied the public with information of historical value in the course of three lengthy interviews in the Leader of Allahabad. We should much wish them to be published in the form of a pamphlet. Later, it may be hoped, Sir Tej will publish his reminiscences as Member of the Government of India and of the Round Table Conference in which he was the most outstanding figure from British India. Sir Tej was a member of the Government of India at the time the events recorded in his interviews happened. They are, in fact, now recalled as a testimony to the statesmanship of Lord Reading who died recently and who was then Viceroy of India. Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru's reminiscences show that Lord Reading's judicial training and tradition made him exceedingly averse from resorting to Executive action in dealing with political unrest. In his first interview he mentions two instances which vividly illustrate the dangers of the statutory division of India into several autonomous Provinces. Though the Presidencies were not autonomous they caused great embarrassment to the Central Government in its negotiations for a peaceful settlement of political differences—the Bengal Government by arresting Mr. C. R. Das, when Lord Reading had called a meeting of his Executive Council at Calcutta itself to consider a settlement, and the Bombay Government by arresting Mr. Gandhi, against the decision arrived at a few days previously by the Government of India. An interesting point of some topical interest is that, while Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru was standing out successfully in the Government of India against the arrest of Gandhiji, his fellow Liberals in the Government of Bombay—there were at least three of them, Members and Ministers—would seem to have acquiesced in it. The incident gives point to our remark in the Reformer of 18th January that acceptance or non-acceptance of office, is more a matter of personal scruple than of political principle in the present state of our political development. If the Liberals in the Bombay Government had taken as strong an attitude as Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru in the Government of India, the course of recent political history might have been very different. There is of course, the consideration that Sir Tej had to deal with one who had been Lord Chief Justice of England before he came to India and the Bombay Liberals, with one who had only a forceful personality. It is quite probable that if the Liberals in the Bombay Government had resigned, others with only communal affiliations would have been ready to take their places. But their resignation would have strengthened the hands of the Secretary of State for India, Mr. Montagu, who, we gather from Sir Tej's reminiscences, was inclined to back the Government of India.

Federal University at Delhi:—The Reformer has more than once suggested that a Post Graduate University at Delhi would be the best means of maintaining a high standard of education in the Universities of India especially after the introduction of provincial autonomy. To study and achieve distinction in such a University will be the ambition of the brightest students all over the country and even of students from abroad. The Professors will likewise be recruited from all over the world without distinction of race or nationality. The Imperial University at Delhi, as we should prefer it to be called, will be one of the great cultural centres of the world. The University will have liberal endowments for the encouragement of all departments of study, Religion, Philosophy, Science. Our dream of the Imperial University of India is thus far more ambitious than his which the Commissioner of Education with the Government of India described in a Delhi broadcast some days ago. According to an Associated Press summary, Sir George Anderson explained how Delhi might become the seat of a great Federal University. He said: "The youngest but more beautiful university would require to make its colleges surrender part of their autonomy for a common endeavour and to regulate education on lines chalked out by the Central Advisory Board." He asked the authorities of Delhi University not to enter into competition with other universities, but to strike a new line in respect of certain higher studies. "Delhi University could develop and specialise in the study of political science, which would be of special use at the capital where the greatest experiment in human history was to be tried. Similarly, instead of the present miserable Law Colleges of India, Delhi University could develop a Law Department, including the study of constitutional law. Again, instead of having the Lady Irwin College for Women as a derelict institution, Delhi University might specialise in higher studies for the women of India. If the authorities of Delhi University developed plans on such lines, the Government of India might also assist. He hoped Delhi University would give a lead to the entire country." This scheme, so far as it goes, is on right lines, though the reference to "the greatest experiment in human history" need not have been brought into this educational and non-controversial context. We do not understand Sir George Anderson to mean that the present undergraduate teaching should be dropped. Post graduate studies can prosper only when there is a background of undergraduate teaching. Delhi as a provincial University is a wasteful superfluity. As a University for advanced studies it has practically a virgin field.

Iqbal on Islam:—The last issue of the Lahore fortnightly, Islam, appeared as a booklet of about thirty small pages containing an essay by Sir Mahomed Iqbal entitled "Islam and Ahmadism with a reply to questions raised by Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru". We reprint the latter part of the essay with a few omissions necessitated by exigencies of space. In the first and larger half, Sir Mahomed sets forth at length his reasons for regarding Ahmadism or Qadianism as being opposed to Islam as well as the interests of Indian nationalism. We are not sufficiently informed about Qadianism to estimate Sir Mahomed's animadversions against it. But we have great admiration for Bahaism with which he couples it more than once. If Qadianism is even in broad outline similar to Bahaism, it must be regarded as a valuable contribution to the spiritual progress of the human race whatever its relation may be to the orthodox interpretation of Islam. The Poet goes so far as to suggest that the two movements have been encouraged by non-Muslim Imperialist Powers for their own sinister ends. "Russia," he writes, "offered tolerance to Bahaism to open their first missionary centre in Ishqabad. England showed Ahmadis the same tolerance in allowing them to open their first missionary centre in Woking. Whether Russia and England showed this tolerance on the ground of Imperial expediency or pure broadmindedness is difficult for us to decide." What Imperialist interest is furthered by the mosque at Woking? A great Bahai temple was half-completed in Ann Arbor in the United States three years ago. What Imperial interest can the United States have in allowing this place of an alien worship to be raised on its soil? Sir Mahomed Iqbal, for a great poet, is singularly inappreciative of the spirit which welcomes light from all sides and deems it a point of national honour to offer hospitality to all search after Truth. Imperialism has acquired a bad odour since it became associated with colonialism in modern times, which, it is our earnest hope, it will outlive. True Imperialism is uniting, harmonising, uplifting. Such was the Imperialism of Asoka and Akbar, of the Moorish rulers under whom Spain shone as the light of Europe in her dark ages, of the Emperors of China under whom Religion and Art flourished exceedingly. Sir Mahomed regards toleration as most often the result of weakness and intolerance as a sign of spiritual virility. In the latter part of his essay, however he veers completely round and makes out that Kemal Ataturk's reforms, including the abolition of the Caliphate, are according with the spirit of Islam.
